ANNOUNCEMENT.

On and after July 1, 1920, the subscription price of the Argonaut will be $5.00 per year. The publisher regrets the necessity for this advance, which is due to the largely increased cost of everything entering into the manufacture of the paper.

The Convention.

As we write on Wednesday morning the Democratic National Convention enters upon its third session. Up to now its only accomplishment has been that of organization, with the naming of the several committees from which reports must be received before the convention can settle down to constructive work. Only the committee on membership has as yet reported, and out of its work has come the first notable clash of forces. In the case of Senator Reed, elected a delegate from the Fifth Missouri District, there was a sharp conflict between the Wilsonites and the independent element, the result being overwhelming victory for the former. There was a technical flaw in Reed's credentials, albeit there was no question as to his being the choice of his district. There was no contestant for his seat and under ordinary circumstances there would have been no question about confirming him as a delegate. But in the past year Senator Reed has stood in opposition to President Wilson's league of nations project, and thus has brought down upon himself the executive wrath. Forces in the convention representative of Mr. Wilson's views and purposes sought to punish Reed by excluding him from the convention. They succeeded in getting an adverse report from the credentials committee and later in getting an adverse vote from the convention itself. By this action the Fifth Missouri District, which includes the great city of Kansas City, was left without representation.

The Reed incident is only one of many things tending to illustrate the general mastery of Mr. Wilson over the convention. In all the phases of organization the controlling hand of the President is plainly in evidence. In his opening address the temporary chairman, in a speech said to have been read and approved by Mr. Wilson, gave to the Administration unmeasured approval. The permanent chairman is notably a friend of the Administration. Senator Glass, named as chairman of the platform committee, was recently a member of the President's cabinet, and was the author of certain resolutions lately adopted by the state convention of Virginia in which the Wilson administration was indorsed unqualifiedly. These incidents, with others less notable but equally significant, indicate unmistakably the power of the President in the business of inspiring and guiding convention procedures. In truth it could hardly be otherwise in a convention half made up of Federal officers or employees, appointed by or through the favor of the Administration, directly under the influence of five members of the President's cabinet present in San Francisco and active in promoting the wishes of their chief. While no open and positive word has come from Mr. Wilson, it is none the less plainly evident that his is the hand that up to now had directed events as they have developed in the opening days.

Whether or not Mr. Wilson shall be able to dictate the nominations remains to be seen. His wishes in this respect have not been declared and may only be inferred from events whose significance is more or less vague. It is not known—at least not publicly—if the President himself wants the nomination, though this is suspected by many. It is not known whether the President is or is not behind the candidacy of his son-in-law, ex-Secretary McAdoo—otherwise the "Crown Prince." It is not known what the President's attitude is with respect to Secretaries Palmer and Colby, both of whom are actual or nominal candidates for the presidential nomination. But while the President's wishes are thus kept dark the impression is general that he desires the nomination of McAdoo as a means of enforcing the course he has inaugurated and further of sustaining a domestic relationship to the presidential office. In the judgment of the Argonaut Mr. Wilson first of all wants the nomination for himself; and failing in that—and the convention is not likely to nominate a man grievously sick and more or less distempered in mind—he would like to bestow it upon his son-in-law. Time must quickly solve this riddle.

Interest these two days past has largely centered in the proceedings of the committee on platform, which has many knotty matters under consideration. The issues of "wet" or "dry," of the party attitude on the demands of organized labor, the "Irish cause," the league of nations project—these and other matters concerning which there are radical differences of feeling and judgment—are being threshed out before the committee. What the outcome may be nobody may now know. The only certainty is that there must be compromises, precisely as there were compromises at Chicago; and the prospect is for a hodge-podge of colorless platitudes.

Prophecies that Mr. Bryan would prove a disturbing factor in the convention have not as yet been fulfilled. Bryan's activities up to now have been limited to loose lobby talk and to a brief hearing upon the issue of prohibition by the committee on platform. The probability is that if he does not secure from the committee the "dry" plank that he desires he will present his case before the convention when it shall come to consider the committee report. Common expectation looks to the opening of flood-gates of passionate oratory on the liquor issue, the league of nations issue, and the "Cause of Ireland."

There is as yet no approach to clarity in the matter of the presidential nomination. Mr. McAdoo, despite his pre-convention declaration, now appears as the leading candidate upon the pretty general presumption that he will have the support of the presidential forces. But against him there stands a strong though loosely organized opposition made up of friends of some dozen or more active or receptive candidates. In such a situation one guess is as good as another.

Our good old town, not unjustly famous for "knowing how," is doing itself proud as a host. Nobody has thus far reported any gouging on the part of anybody—or even any lack of courtesy. While the Volstead law has put the kibosh—in public places—upon one conventional form of hospitality, it has not been able wholly to down the pleasant conjunction of ice, glass, and stimulating liquids. In other respects San Francisco has been able to sustain its repute for cordial and generous treatment of those who come as guests within its gates.

Editorial Correspondence.

Pressure of more immediate interests has postponed until now the setting forth of observations made in the course of a recent brief visit to the national capital. It was in the early days of this month and coincident with the veto directly or by the "pocketing" process of a grist of important bills. By many members of Congress, representing both parties, and by close observers generally, the President's action was regarded as significant of his physical and mental condition. Similarly significant in the view of many persons of judgment was his telegram of the 5th inst. to the railroad labor chiefs bitterly denouncing Congress. In the veto of the bill repealing war legislation, along with a series of measures of relatively minor importance, there is clearly the reflection of a disappointed, morose, and vindictive invalidism holding jealously and stubbornly to extraordinary powers granted for war purposes only and to its own interpretation of the Constitution and the laws as affecting the rights and prerogatives of the presidency.

The veto of the budget bill was based upon a paragraph in it giving to Congress alone the power to remove the Comptroller-General and Assistant Comptroller-General—new offices created by the bill. This provision had been in the bill for weeks. The President had full opportunity to let his friends in Congress know of his opposition to it, if his opposition were not a recent development. But he refrained from making objection until Congress was about to adjourn, and then upset the constructive work that had been done on this wholesome bill upon the plea that the powers of the Executive were being invaded.

Some Republicans, as well as many Democrats, hold that there is a measure of reason in Mr. Wilson's contention, but at the same time it is true that the sounder constitutional lawyers in and out of Congress hold the contrary opinion. If a mistake was made in the bill it was in permitting the President rather than Congress to appoint the Comptroller-General in the first instance. The purpose of the Comptroller-General's office fined in the bill, is to assume general charge of the making of a budget. Essentially under the Constitution that is the business of Congress itself, since Congress holds the power of the purse. If it delegates a part of that authority it should logically be to an agent of its own and not to a creature of the President.

The purpose of the bill was to set up an expert authority that should in a measure be independent both of Congress and of the President. The makers of the bill had in mind an officer who should hold his position upon a permanent or practically permanent tenure, and who should not in any respect be a political appointee or subject to the passing whims of the appointing power. In providing that the President should have the right of original appointment the Republicans in Congress made a large concession in the hope of securing early establishment of the budget system. They went so far as to allow Mr. Wilson to select the first Comptroller-General and to make it extremely difficult for a Republican Congress, without extraordinary justification, to remove him. All this was lost upon the President, whose vision, obviously, was narrowed to immediate partisan considerations.

The President's state of mind was again unpleasantly exhibited in his pocket veto of the water-power bill, an action that amazed even his official family. Many theories, most of them purely imaginary and largely foolish, are afloat regarding Mr. Wilson's reasons for permitting the water-power bill to die. The truth is that this action was due entirely to the whim of a tired and peevish man. This bill was the President's own baby. In several positive utterances he has demanded that Congress enact just such a bill. A year ago he was active in promoting the measure, and since that time it has not been changed in principle and very little in text. The bill reached the White House on Monday, May 31st, in the afternoon. Under routine practice it was sent in turn to the heads of departments that it affected—to the Secretary of War, the Secretary of the Interior, and the Secretary of Agriculture. The Secretary of Agriculture gave it enthusiastic approval. The Secretary of War approved it with only a little less enthusiasm. The Secretary of the Interior approved it in general, but called attention to the fact that it permitted water-power development in national parks, a provision that has been in the bill all along for a year past, but apparently was new to the new Secretary of the Interior, John Barton Payne.

I was told that the bill with several others came under the President's hand on Saturday afternoon. He was tired, crabby, finding fault with all about him, and still under spell of the rage which had moved him when an hour or so before he had dictated his telegram to the railroad labor chiefs denouncing Congress. While he did not read attentively the reports of the cabinet officers, his eye lit upon Payne's paragraph with reference to the national park feature. With an angry exclamation and some mumbled words about the bill having been sent him at the last moment he pushed it across the table and went on to consider other matters. It is possible that Mr. Wilson did not realize what he was doing. However, the consequences for mischief are prodigious. At that moment there were men in Washington with applications ready to file applying for licenses under the bill that would have meant immediate investment of $150,000,000 in projects for development of power very much needed by the industry of the country. In this incident we get a glimpse of what it is costing to maintain the fiction that the President is qualified physically under the constitutional provision to discharge the duties of his office.

In many of the President's acts in the last week of the congressional session there is to be discovered a deliberate intention to withhold from Congress any credit for constructive legislation. All that saved the shipping bill from veto was the personal intercession of the Secretary of the Interior, Mr. Payne. It had gotten gossiped about the Capitol that the President was determined to punish Congress in some emphatic way. The expectation was that he would seize upon the shipping bill for slaughter. Not for a moment did anybody suspect that a restraining hand would fall upon the water-power bill, which all along from its inception until the last moment had his approval and support.

In the halls of the Capitol, in the private offices of members of Congress, in hotel lobbies, and even over dinner-tables at the time of my visit in the early days of the month there was much gossip about the physical and mental condition of the President. All who had seen him in his motor rides—few see him at other times—bear witness to a worn and haggard appearance. Nobody, so gossip ran, had seen him in any other position than seated, and the common understanding was that he was unable to walk. I was told that while driving through Rock Creek Park in the period of my visit he stopped his machine and violently berated a group of workmen employed in cutting down trees that had been marked for destruction, and for sufficient reasons, by the park authorities. He told the foreman that under no circumstances were any trees to be cut in the park without his express orders. I was further told that on another recent occasion he flew into a rage when his motor was caught in a traffic jam near the Soldiers' Home incident to the operations of a repair gang that had torn up part of the roadway. According to this report he howled savagely at a traffic policeman who was trying to break the jam and ordered him to see to it that a passageway be always kept open for the presidential car.

By a gentleman close in touch with the government I was told that at a recent meeting of the cabinet Mrs. Wilson gave to each member a whispered warning to let the President do all the talking and not to bring up any departmental matters. It was further declared that when cabinet meetings are held the room is dimly lighted and that the President sits with his face almost entirely in shadow, motionless, resting his left elbow on the table, and rarely attempting any use of his right hand. From these and a multitude of similar reports I have the impression that Mr. Wilson continues to be a very sick man, not wholly incapacitated, but under severe nervous strain reflected in an intense irritability, peevishness about trifles, with at times inability to concentrate his mental powers.

The situation of affairs at Washington as it has existed now for something more than a year illustrates the political advantage in operating a government in which the several executive departments have no responsibility to each other and in which there is no co-ordination of information or of purpose. Thus while the President has been denouncing Congress for failure to revise revenue laws, the various members of the cabinet, with the single exception of Secretary Houston, have been denouncing Congress for its failure to appropriate more money. Mr. Houston is the only man at the head of an executive department who has lifted his voice for economy. Nobody attempts to reconcile (1) Houston's demand for economy, (2) the demand of the President for lower taxes, and (3) the demand of the various cabinetiers for more money.

Secretary Meredith of the Department of Agriculture recently launched an elaborate publicity campaign because, to borrow his own words, "Congress has reduced by $2,185,000 the appropriation for the work of the Department of Agriculture during the year beginning July 1st. The chiefs of bureaus have enumerated for me some sixty important lines of work that will have to be abandoned or curtailed as the result of that reduction." The Secretary goes on to name the states, including California, that will suffer grievously for lack of funds.

Mr. Meredith's complaint rests upon the fact that Congress has granted to his department for the fiscal year 1921 $31,712,784 as compared with $33,899,761 for the current year. To make his case good he cites the history of accomplishments of the Department of Agriculture in the past. Curiously the particular accomplishments upon which he places special emphasis are those of several years ago. Going over the records of the department I find that in 1902 under the direction of the then Secretary Wilson the department had for a whole year only $4,582,420; in 1906 it had $6,882,690; in 1908 it had $9,447,290. With the passing of Secretary Wilson and the coming in of Democratic administration in 1913 appropriations for the Department of Agriculture increased rapidly. Thus in 1915 they had grown to $27,103,334; and by the current year to $33,899,761. It is to be observed that since 1908 the expenditures of the Department of Agriculture have more than tripled. Can the farmers of the country say that the benefits have more than tripled in the same time?

that the country wants a revision of the revenue laws, if by revision he means revision downward. But he and his appointees have made it impossible for any immediate result; and a revision that does not contemplate reduction at this time will make even more chaotic the financial condition of the country.

It appears that Secretary Houston is not the only man connected with the Administration who has a glimmer of the true situation. Mr. William B. Colver a member of the Federal Trade Commission, has within the week made a declaration of high significance. I quote two significant paragraphs:

The excess profits tax, never a revenue measure, is a penalty upon economy, upon conservative capitalization, and upon quantity production. It never was intended to be a revenue measure. It is a cornerstone in the present intolerable price structure and it should be repealed.

We hear talk of increasing the percentages in the upper brackets of the income-tax schedule, especially with reference to raising another billion or two or three to provide a general soldier bonus. It is quite easy and extremely popular to say "tax the rich." But what we are actually doing now is to tax the capital of the rich out of productive enterprises and into non-productive. As the law stands, a man with a $20,000 income can invest in state or municipal bonds, non-taxable, at 4½ per cent. and with practically no risk, while to net the same rate of income any investment in industry or trade must yield him 5 1/3 per cent.—to say nothing of the element of risk. The man with $50,000 income must receive 6½ per cent. from his productive investment in order to be able to pay his tax and yet net 4½ per cent. that the non-taxable offer him. The $100,000 income must earn 10¼ per cent. and the $500,000 income must earn 15 per cent. in order to net the sure 4½ per cent. that the non-taxable state and municipal bonds pay.

There is nothing new in these presentments. What Mr. Colver says has been said by others over and over again. But it is, so far as my observation goes, the first time any official associated with the Administration has had the temerity to speak out in meeting.

Editorial Notes.

The menace of radicalism in the schools of the country appears not to be limited to institutions of the purely academic type. If we may credit a report made by an investigating committee of the Connecticut diocese to Bishop Brewster, socialistic and even Bolshevik teaching is "rampant" in at least one of the divinity schools of the country. In the report made to Bishop Brewster it is stated with respect to the Berkeley Divinity School "that a lecture delivered on December 2d last was Bolshevik propaganda; that the lecture was by Wilfred Humphries of the Intercollegiate Socialist Society; that it would have been better had this lecture not been given; that Humphries ought not to have been allowed use of the platform; that the school has suffered, its prestige lessened, and its progress hindered by the reputation it has received; that Dean Ladd of the divinity school is not a Socialist, but he is a member of several societies of socialistic tendencies, including the Intercollegiate Society, of which Dean Ladd and Professor Lauderdrun were members of the executive committee, among whose members are many men known as Socialists; also a member of the Committee of Forty-Eight, and that he signed the first call for a meeting of the same, and that the society is an organization of radical tendencies."

The presidency is by no means the only interest of high importance to be determined in the coming November elections. The margin of Republican control in the Senate is narrow, almost to the vanishing point. At present there are forty-eight Republican senators and one "Republican Progressive"—La Follette—as against forty-seven Democrats. Thirty-two senators will automatically lose their seats on March 3, 1921. Seventeen of these are Democrats and fifteen are Republicans. In case Senator Newberry loses his seat the Republican strength will be depleted by one more vote. Thus the situation hinges upon the coming elections; and it is natural that there should be intense anxiety on the part of the Republican leaders, including the nominee for the presidency, as to the various senatorial campaigns. Every possible effort will be made by the Republicans to keep the party in control of the Senate, and to this end an organization has been perfected and is actively at work upon campaign plans in the several states where there is the possibility of party success. Mr. Harding is intensely interested in the situation, realizing that in the event of his election it will be of first importance that the Senate in a political sense shall be harmonious in relation to his own views and purposes. If the elections this fall should give the Democrats control of the Senate he would upon taking office be confronted with a situation identical with that now faced by President Wilson.

A minor incident in the record of the Chicago convention illustrates the fact that the path of the political dodger is beset by many perils. Delegate Rolph—none other than our more or less respected "Chimmie"—was, of course, profoundly and chiefly solicitous to preserve his record as a "friend of labor." When it came to the vice-presidential nomination he was unwilling to vote with the rest of the California delegation for Governor Coolidge because of his action in suppressing the policemen's strike at Boston. With little time to think the situation over Mr. Rolph's preference was for Lenroot, and he was on the point of recording his vote for the Wisconsin senator when somebody reminded him that it might be taken as an indication of pro-German propensities. In haste and confusion, and under the immediate necessity of placing his vote somewhere, Mr. Rolph voted for Governor Allen of Kansas. A moment later, informed by a fellow-delegate of Allen's attitude in the strike of last winter, he attempted vainly to get the eye of the chairman and to recall his vote. But by this time the poll had proceeded to a point where Coolidge's nomination was assured; and in the acclamation and confusion our Jimmie's appeal was not heard. Thus our precious mayor, who crawls on his tummy before the whippers-in of labor, stands in the record of the convention as having voted for Governor Allen, the protagonist of Gompers, a man definitely opposed to the pretensions of the radical labor champions. Verily the political trimmer, if he would preserve consistency in subserviency, must have his wits about him.

Transfer of the Mexican "presidency" from Carranza to Obregon has not altered the general situation. The confusion and disorder that have reigned with more or less virulence during the past seven years continue. Obregon is now busy in a series of quarrels with members of his own party, and there is no assurance that he may not soon find himself in a position identical with that in which he recently stood in relation to his predecessor. Brigandage is still rife in various parts of the country, particularly in the northwest, where Villa continues to have things his own way. He goes wherever he chooses attended by a well-armed and well-mounted force of anywhere from five hundred to a thousand men, making requisitions for money or whatever else he wants, and enforcing them. Obviously Obregon, "strong man" though he is reported to be, is powerless to dominate the country and enforce order. It may as truly be said now as it was said in these columns seven years ago, and at various times since then, that the problem of Mexico is one impossible of solution by the Mexicans. A man of the genius and power of Diaz might possibly pacify the country, but such men are rare and there is no indication that Mexico is in the way of finding a real master. First or last the work of pacification will have to be done from without—which is only another way of saying that it must be done by the United States. For the good of Mexico, as well as for our own interest and security, the sooner we get at the job the better.

An investigation of the subject of industrial fatigue conducted in the government shops by the English government resulted in obtaining a great deal of valuable information. It has been the means in many cases of a great increase of the output, and these investigations are about to be extended generally to all British industrial establishments by a recently established industrial fatigue research board, under the department of scientific and industrial research and the medical research committee. The duties of the board will be to initiate, organize, and promote, by research, grants, or otherwise, investigations in different industries with the view of finding the most favorable hours of labor, spells of work, rest pauses, etc.

On the barren wastes at Is-sur-Tille, France, a vast field is covered with implements of war, including artillery carriages and machine guns. This assortment of military equipment has been sold to France for 3,000,000,000 francs.

Like our own leap year, every third year in China is longer than its predecessors, but the Chinese add a whole month, instead of an extra day.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR.

A Protest in Memory of St. Francis.

SAN FRANCISCO, June 29, 1920.
TO THE EDITOR—Sir: San Francisco means and is Saint Francis, who, as every one knows, was the "big brother" to all humankind and to whom the animals and birds were "little brothers."
If our citizens, neighbors, visitors, and the strangers within our gates should ponder a moment over the earnest life of Saint Francis, and remembering that his impress endures through the ages, they will not affront his memory with "Frisco."

NATHANIEL BLAISDELL.

From a Pessimist.

REDLANDS, June 28, 1920.
TO THE EDITOR—Sir: Greetings on what may prove to be the last Independence Day on which our country is really and truly independent. If the Wilson party is retained in power with included league of nations as proposed we will thenceforth be under the dictation, not of peoples of nearly our own race, blood, interests, and ideals as was the case when the American states united, but under the dictation of foreigners of different language, race, and interests, having no sympathy with our aspirations or our ideals and interfering with any of our affairs they may consider or pretend concerns the peace of the world. Thus the next Fourth of July may witness the heretofore brilliant horizon of American liberty, prosperity, and future threatened by at least one cloud, the war cloud of another war of secession—an international one.

URSON R. WALLACE.

Prohibition and Our "Foreign Born."

SAN FRANCISCO, June 20, 1920.
TO THE EDITOR—Sir: Among the loyal citizens of our foreign population and their native-born offspring there exists an intense discontent about the prohibition of table wines. They will not believe that a government can become so preposterous in its regulations as to wipe out a time-honored custom. The fundamental reason for this justifiable rebellion against what is now included in "law and order" is that these people have mastered the rules of diet far better than our native Americans, whose traditions are unfortunately rooted in rum and whisky.

Our foreign-born citizens and their descendants have assumed none of that hypocritical and legally imposed virtue of abstinence, nor do they suffer much from nervousness and dyspepsia. They look upon table wines for their dietetic value rather than for their alcoholic effect. For it is well known that fruit acids, such as citric, malic, and especially tartaric acid in the grape and wine, are powerful aids to digestion. They go even farther than that—at least our Italian friends—and drink wines that contain lactic acid, another valuable preventive of intestinal disorders.

While our Italian friends, therefore, prefer a little lactic acid in their wine, our French compatriots will have none of it. The Frenchman desires, not only the acid in the wine for his digestion, but also thoroughly enjoys the fine aroma of the drink. With him it is not the alcohol that counts, or as it is here vulgarly called "kick," but rather the other qualities of the wine. For to the European a good table wine is at once a nutritive beverage as well as a tonic of moderate price that prevents doctors' bills and drunkenness. This "alien" estimate of table wines may not impress the average American, but it seems to show far more wisdom and culture than our childish provincialism that recognizes nothing but the alcohol, or "kick," in wine.

The philosophy of drinking, therefore, resolves itself into the appreciation, not only of its dietetic value, but also of its enjoyable effects on the senses of smell and taste, besides that of a mild relaxation due to a small quantity of alcohol. Moreover, the habit of drinking wines with meals tends toward a dislike for strong drink, and is in itself a patent on moderation.

Our deplorable madness of establishing and maintaining "moral welfare" by means of law is on a level with the spirit of the Spanish Inquisition; and just as the latter did not make people religious so will prohibition not make people good. Besides, like the Inquisition, such government interference with the personal conduct and liberty of free men will finally lead to open revolt. No government can stand that is run by fanatics, for a fanatic is one who wants to compel his neighbor by law to think the way he thinks and to do the way he does. This is not liberty, but intolerable coercion. No wonder there is much unrest in our land. There will be more of it despite our present policy of suppression.

R. JORDAN, JR.

Colonel Washington Bowie, who was a leading figure in the company that originally manufactured the ouija board, narrated, while testifying in the case of Fuld vs. Fuld, that in the early part of 1890 Mr. E. C. Reichie, a cabinetmaker of Chestertown, Kent County, Maryland, invented the ouija board. In that year spiritism was in the flush of its early glory, and tables rapped and pranced on every side. Mr. Reichie, although not a spiritist, noticed sympathetically that a large table was a heavy thing for a frail spirit to juggle about. His meditations, attuned to cabinetmaking, took a practical form. He devised a little table—the ouija board. The other legend relates that Mr. C. W. Kennard sat idly in the kitchen of his Maryland home. He has nothing to do, nothing to think about. In this blissful state he reached out and took his wife's bread board and placed it on his lap, and then placed a saucer on the bread board. The saucer began to move, as though of its own volition. Mr. Kennard was amazed, frightened, interested, impressed, inspired, and delighted. He saw both spooks and commercial possibilities. This was a momentous event in the history of this world and the other world, too. A thousand oracles might have spoken; the greatest shades in Avernus might have loomed; the voice of Caesar might have discoursed upon the military and political value of the short Roman sword; Aristotle might have expounded philosophy; without working half the effect wrought by that talismanic phrase: commercial possibilities. The saucer on the bread board might have revealed the secret of human happiness, or of universal knowledge, or of good government, without recommending itself half so well as it did when it suggested the idea that it might be a good seller.

HARDING AND COOLIDGE.

Senator Warren G. Harding is the first professional journalist to enter the White House. There have been twenty lawyers, one planter, two soldiers, one teacher, and two public officials—Johnson and Roosevelt—but until now the party choice has never fallen to a journalist. Senator Warren G. Harding started in life as a printer's devil in Marion, Ohio, and worked there as printer, reporter, circulation manager, business manager, editor, and publisher.

These facts are gleaned from a sketch of Senator Harding appearing in the New York Times of June 13th. Senator Harding, says the Times, has preached and practiced the straight Republican doctrine at all periods of his career. He has been a strong and active member of Republican organizations. He stood with the stalwart remnant of his party for Taft in 1912. He made the keynote speech at the Republican National Convention of 1916. He was one of the strongest supporters of the war in Congress, and without being an irreconcilable he has been a staunch reservationist on the peace treaty. He has been one of the severest critics of President Wilson, but not a vituperative one.

Senator Harding's record is not one that will wholly recommend him to the American Federation of Labor. He advocated the anti-strike clause of the Cummins railroad bill, committing himself in a letter to the following definite principle:

If the government, representing all the people, can not guarantee transportation under any and all conditions, it fails utterly. If that same government can not provide just consideration for the workmen operating the transportation systems it fails again. It ought to and it must do both.

Senator Harding was noted as an orator early in his congressional career:

During his early years in Congress Senator Harding attracted the attention of visitors at the Capitol by his oratory, which had a powerful effect on those within the range of his voice. In Ohio he had for twenty years borne the reputation of being one of the leading "silver-tongued" orators. Handsome and big, with an impressive bearing, a sonorous voice, and dignity of gesture, the senator made his name as an orator by his swaying of audiences rather than newspaper readers. During his early years in the Senate he was generally overlooked by the press or received scant attention.

Senator Harding was practically unknown to the country when he was put forward as a possible dark horse and presidential candidate in 1916. His friends predicted that he would make a great speech as the keynote orator at the Republican convention in that year. It was awaited eagerly and fell rather flat. His task was that of proving that President Wilson's administration had blundered in dealing with Germany without giving the country to understand that the Republican party intended to reverse that policy by plunging the nation into war.

Senator Harding was a strong supporter of all war measures, even going so far as to advocate a war dictatorship. In the New York Times of August 12, 1917, he defended his opinion against the charge of un-Americanism:

Whether it is or is not American, it will be made American, once the conditions is an established fact; but at the same time let me answer your question more fairly by a short glance at our history, as I see it. While I am neither historian nor constitutional lawyer, it appears to me that the experience of the founder of our nationality, George Washington, had convinced him that in times of national crisis supreme power should be vested in one head and that all responsibility as well as all power should be vested there. In his matchless vision Hamilton saw the necessity of such provision and his influence in the drafting of the Constitution, exerted through Washington, was such that every avenue was opened for casting to one man in a crisis all the power.

Senator Harding showed himself to be an uncompromising opponent of the league of nations' as it now stands. In the communication already quoted he discusses some of its many features and its results upon the democratic progress of the world:

No one disputes the commendable purpose, as the world understands it. Maybe the world hasn't sensed the big contradiction. We talk freely and enthusiastically of democracy and self-determination, and yet the league clearly proposes to perpetuate the great empires of the world, proposes to hold Great Britain, France, Italy, and Japan intact, and we are to give of our man power and resources, as well as moral force, to do so. No new republic like our very own will ever be born in the world while the league keeps it compact.

Either the covenant involves a surrender of national sovereignty and submits our future destiny to the league, or it is an empty thing, big in name, and will ultimately disappoint all of humanity that hinges hope on it.

One general illustration will indicate the latter phase of it. The world wishes disarmament. The nations ought to disarm to the greatest possible extent. The covenant also looks to reduce armaments, and says the council shall formulate a plan and recommend it, but no limitation shall be binding except as the nation concerned approves. Admittedly the compact must be so expressed, unless we abandon our Constitution; but what promise is there in the covenant save the exercise of conscience by the nation involved? We like to think the United States is ready to do its part without signing so meaningless a compact.

Much of the covenant is good. The permanent Court of International Justice, to determine all international problems which the several nations agree to submit to it, is strongly appealing. With such a court and with a clearly established code of international law there could never be a dispute in the future that would not array the conscience-driven nation on the one righteous side.

If he was in favor of a war dictatorship Senator Harding was certainly not in favor of a peace dictatorship nor of a personal tyranny exercised in the name of democracy. It was in that direction that President

Wilson's policies, and particularly his European trips, were drifting:

In this uncertain pursuit of a modern idealism we are drifting in that direction: I am not imputing any questionable motives to the President's trip abroad. I am only doubting the practicability of that trip. If the President had gone abroad as the American premier or as the head of the American Peace Commission, to which he has appointed himself, and after concluding the peace treaty had made a triumphal tour of Europe I would have rejoiced, for there is no jealousy in my soul. But he should have gone abroad to conclude a treaty of peace as soon as possible. In chasing the dream of idealism he has neglected that great essential. He has neglected the practical things here at home in the United States. We have been infinitely more neglectful in preparing for the duties of peace than in preparing for the duties of war.

Senator Harding has never hesitated to express definite opinions on the great economic questions of the day and he has done this with a courage and an independence that his opponents are already beginning to deny. So far as the high cost of living is concerned he said in a recent speech: "You can not reduce the present cost of living and keep up the present American wage. It is demagoguery to say otherwise. I think the war will have been waged in vain if we do not go back to the old conditions that prevailed before the war."

If you do not have a fairer division of profits of business here you will have more Bolshevism in the United States than you have in Russia. Common labor in some cases is now receiving $1 an hour. It is time to be practical. We can fix an American policy for ourselves at home. We have taxed the big industrial enterprises until they are almost paralyzed. Why not, instead of giving so much attention to the expenditure of $100,000,000 to feed the people of Europe, give more attention to the taxpayer?

Governor Calvin Coolidge of Massachusetts, who has received the Republican vice-presidential nomination, first won the applause of the nation by his attitude toward the Boston police strike last year. He is said to be plain in speech, manner, dress, habits, and tastes. His natural gifts, says the Times, are somewhat obscured by a shy disposition. Says the Times:

During the early days of the police strike that upset the peace of mind of staid old Boston and of the whole state Governor Coolidge exhibited his readiness to accept advice as to his course of action when he summoned a group of prominent citizens to confer with him. They represented the various professions and businesses, as well as other classes who were familiar with conditions in the city. That was after the local officials apparently had failed to estimate the gravity of the situation, or failed to show their ability to meet it.

The various phases of the controversy were discussed at this conference, and to the views of all the governor listened attentively. Then he arose from his seat suddenly and said to those present:

"Gentlemen, I thank you. I see my way clearly. I am going to act."

Without any further explanation from the governor the conference came to an abrupt end. Subsequently in his first executive order he directed the police commissioner to proceed with the performance of his duty, a power which that official was denied by the action of the mayor of Boston. The governor then said that he would uphold the police commissioner, and he did.

After he had thus restored the controversy to its fundamental status he called on the Army and Navy Departments at Washington to be ready to cooperate with him to the extent of sending such forces as might be necessary. He then waited for the next move of the striking police. Those who sought to learn from the governor what would be his course of action from that point learned only that he was determined to enforce law and order at whatever cost.

Although Governor Coolidge has a quiet manner he has a forceful way of driving home his points. Here are some of his sayings:

No man has a right to place his own ease or convenience above his duty to the state.

The action of the police in leaving their posts was not a strike, but desertion.

We can not think of arbitrating the government.

The government of Massachusetts is not seeking to resist the lawful action or sound policy of organized labor. It is seeking to prevent a condition which would at once destroy all labor unions and all else that is the foundation of civilization.

We need more of the office desk and less of the show window in politics.

Let men in office substitute the midnight oil for the lime-light.

We need forever to remember that representative government does represent. A careless, indifferent representative is the result of a careless, indifferent electorate.

The people who start to elect a man to get what he can for his district will probably find that they have elected a man who will get what he can for himself.

Do the day's work. If it be to protect the rights of the weak, whoever objects, do it. If it be to help a powerful corporation better to serve the people, whatever the opposition, do that.

Don't expect to build up the weak by pulling down the strong.

Don't hurry to legislate. Give administration a chance to catch up with legislation.

We need a broader, firmer, deeper faith in the people—a faith that men desire to do right, that the commonwealth is founded upon righteousness which will endure, a reconstructed faith that the final approval of the people is given, not to demagogues slavishly pandering to their selfishness, merchandising with the clamor of the hours, but to statesmen, ministering to their welfare, representing their deep, silent, abiding convictions.

Governor Coolidge has never owned an automobile nor any real estate, and he has occupied the same offices since he was called to the bar.

INDIVIDUALITIES.

Mme. Jane Hervaux, the French aviatrix, proposes to found a school of aviation in Havana, where she intends to devote her efforts toward stimulating interest in aviation among the young women of Cuba.

George White, who qualifies among the Broadway revue producers, was a messenger boy before he became a dancer. He is barely thirty years of age now, and it is only ten years since he broke out of the ranks of the messenger service. He learned his first steps in a music hall on the Bowery, and began his acting career by playing small-time vaudeville houses.

Maude Adams, after an absence of two years from the stage, is said to have sufficiently recovered her health to warrant the announcement that she will be ready to act again by the time the new season rolls around. Undoubtedly Miss Adams, if she returns, would appear in a Barrie play, but on this side of the water it is not yet known whether Barrie's new "Mary Rose" is suited to her. It is unlikely, however, that Sir James will allow Miss Adams to languish for want of a play.

Los Angeles Harbor deep sea divers recently put in a claim for world's record at depths of 130 and 150 feet, made outside the breakwater under the auspices of officers at the United States submarine base. Harry Goldsmith, who is attached to the base, is hailed world's champion at a depth of 130 feet. He won a contest directed by Lieutenant J. B. Cooke, Gunner F. E. Robbins, and Chaplain G. B. Kranz. He stayed below 1 hour 42 minutes 12 seconds, the previous record at this depth having been 1 hour 31 minutes.

Annette Abbott Adams, nominated by President Wilson as Assistant United States Attorney-General after serving for nearly six years as Assistant United States District Attorney in San Francisco, is a living contradiction of the theory that a woman who successfully fills a position traditionally held by a man must eschew all feminine interests and become a short-haired imitator of the man who might be holding the job. Mrs. Adams' native town is Prattville, a small village in the Sierra Nevada Mountains in California, where she was born in 1877. Her father, an Ohio man who went to the Far West in the days of '49, was at first a miner and later a merchant. Her mother had been a school-teacher before her marriage. Her early education was in the California schools, including the Chico Normal School and the University of California, where she received her B. L. degree in 1904.

From painting signs on express wagons at 50 cents a wagon to portraits of members of nearly every royal family in Europe, to say nothing of their friends and advisers, is the distance traveled in the last twenty years by Seymour M. Stone, an American artist who returned to this country last February after fifteen years abroad and has just completed in Washington portraits of the Secretary of War and Mrs. Newton D. Baker, with their three children. He has also been commissioned to paint the portrait of Bainbridge Colby, Secretary of State. Born of American parents, his mother of Russian extraction, he was the only one of a family of five children to show any artistic talent. Between the ages of ten and eighteen he contributed to the family funds by working for various sign-painting firms in Chicago, in whose service he spent the day, attending art classes at night and studying until far into the small hours.

The name of Simon Petlura has again leaped into prominence—this time in connection with the Polish invasion of the Ukraine. For the past year and a half the name of this Ukrainian leader has been more or less familiar to all those who are interested in the affairs of Eastern Europe, particularly of what was formerly the Russian Empire. He is sometimes spoken of as "General Petlura." He is not a military man, however, and never was one. He is of humble origin, the son of a coachman, who, at the time of the son's birth, was earning a meagre livelihood in the South Russian city of Poltava. As a boy Petlura was sent to the Poltava "Bursa," the lower clerical school. His education was continued at the "Seminary," the secondary clerical school, in which he reached the upper class and was then expelled for revolutionary activity. Petlura's youth was thus passed in schools that were to prepare him for the clergy. Instead, he was graduated into the school of the Russian revolution.

On Diomed Island, in Bering Strait, the son-in-law, at the request of his wife's father, kills him when he has reached such an age that he is no longer of use to himself or the community, and the spirit of the whale is regarded as the sole omnipotent force. So says Arthur Eide, for three years a government agent and teacher there, who came to New York long since with a tale of manners and customs so strange as to be reminiscent of the early sagas. Mr. Eide is a Norwegian by birth. He was a sailor in his early youth and traveled the seven seas. He landed in San Francisco in his twenties, speaking half a dozen languages, but not English, and possessing a smattering of knowledge gathered from years of knocking about foreign lands. He was quick to see the opportunities for educational advancement in this country, and within a few years after his arrival he was graduated from a college in California. The history of his endeavor to educate himself has not a little in common with the story of Martin Eden. While at college Mr. Eide met Princess Cood-la-look, a full-blooded Eskimo girl who had been brought to the States when a child by Sheldon Jackson, Alaskan missionary and educator. Mr. Eide married her. Since then the two have devoted their lives to the education of the still primitive peoples of the northernmost possessions of the United States.

OLD FAVORITES.

Faithless Nellie Gray.

Ben Battle was a soldier bold,
And used to war's alarms;
But a cannon-ball took off his legs,
So he laid down his arms.

Now, as they bore him off the field,
Said he, "Let others shoot:
For here I leave my second leg,
And the Forty-Second foot."

The army surgeons made him limbs:
Said he, "They're only pegs;
But there's as wooden members quite,
As represent my legs."

Now Ben he loved a pretty maid—
Her name was Nellie Gray;
So he went to pay her his devours,
When he devoured his pay.

But when he called on Nellie Gray,
She made him quite a scoff;
And when she saw his wooden legs,
Began to take them off.

"O, Nellie Gray! O, Nellie Gray!
Is this your love so warm?
The love that loves a scarlet coat
Should be more uniform."

Said she, "I loved a soldier once,
For he was blithe and brave;
But I will never have a man
With both legs in the grave."

"Before you had those timber toes
Your love I did allow;
But then, you know, you stand upon Another footing now."

"O, Nellie Gray! O, Nellie Gray;
For all your jeering speeches,
At duty's call I left my legs
In Badajoz's breaches."

"Why, then," she said, "you've lost the feet
Of legs in war's alarms,
And now you can not wear your shoes
Upon your feats of arms."

"O, false and fickle Nellie Gray!
I know why you refuse;
Though I've no feet, some other man
Is standing in my shoes."

"I wish I ne'er had seen your face;
But, now, a long farewell!
For you will be my death!—alas!
You will not be my Nell!"

Now when he went from Nellie Gray
His heart so heavy got,
And life was such a burden grown,
It made him take a knot.

So round his melancholy neck
A rope he did entwine,
And for his second time in life,
Enlisted in the line.

One end he tied around a beam,
And then removed his pegs;
And, as his legs were off, of course
He soon was off his legs.

And there he hung, till he was dead
As any nail in town;
For, though distress had cut him up,
It could not cut him down.

A dozen men sat on his corpse,
To find out why he died—
And they buried Ben in four cross-roads,
With a stake in his inside.—Thomas Hood.

The Old Arm Chair.

I love it, I love it, and who shall dare
To chide me for loving the old arm chair?
I've treasur'd it long as a holy prize,
I've hedew'd it with tears, and embalm'd it with sighs,
'Tis bound by a thousand bands to my heart;
Not a tie will break, not a link will start,
Would ye learn the spell?—a mother sat there,
And a sacred thing is that old arm chair.

In childhood's home, I lingered near
The hallow'd seat with list'ning ear:
And gentle words would mother give,
To fit me to die, and teach me to live.
She told me shame would never hetide,
With truth for my creed, and God for my guide:
She taught me to hush my earliest prayer
As I knelt beside that old arm chair.

I sat and watched her many a day,
When her eyes grew dim, and her locks were gray.
And I almost worship'd her when she smiled,
And turn'd from her Bible to bless her child.
Years roll'd on, but the last one sped—
My idol was shattered, my earth-star fled;
I learned how much the heart can bear,
When I saw her die in the old arm chair.

'Tis past: 'tis past; but I gaze on it now
With quivering breath and throbbing brow;
'Twas there she nursed me, 'twas there she died,
And mem'ry flows with lava tide.
Say it is folly, and deem me weak,
While the scalding drops start down my cheek;
But I love it, I love it, and can not tear
My soul from my mother's old arm chair.—Eliza Cook.

A PRISONER OF TROTSKY'S.

Colonel Kalpaschnikoff, Red Cross Emissary, Relates His Russian Experiences.

Colonel Kalpaschnikoff was employed by the American Red Cross on relief work in Russia and Roumania. He was arrested by the Russian Bolsheviks on a charge of intriguing with the American ambassador, Mr. Francis, for the overthrow of the Bolshevik government and confined for five months in the Fortress of St. Peter and St. Paul. Mr. Francis did what he could through the mediation of Raymond Robins for his release, and as a matter of fact he was eventually released, but with greatly impaired health. These facts are stated by Mr. Francis himself in the foreword written by him for the book in which Kalpaschnikoff relates his experiences. Kalpaschnikoff disclaims any desire to discuss the Russian situation in general. He wants only to tell of the things that happened to him, but we may be grateful that sometimes he exceeds his own limitations. None the less his story is in itself a sufficient comment on a situation that seems to have set at defiance all the ordinary canons of historical accuracy.

The author places a large measure of blame for the revolution proper upon the Allies themselves. Russia fell to pieces, he says, and Bolshevism seized its opportunity because it was allowed to do so:

It must not be forgotten that the famous "bloodless revolution" which was so popular in America was not a revolution at all. The country, after the too great strain of the war which had cost us more than seven million men, simply fell to pieces. It is not the place here to speak about the colossal rôle played by Russia in the war, but I shall merely say that, in this struggle of civilization against German oppression, Russia received the first and harder blows and fell exhausted like a wounded soldier. The representatives of the Allies who were supposed to take care of this sick man did not do their duty properly, and infection set in. It was only then that the Revolution really began and Bolshevism lifted its head and took the power into its hands. The Revolution began with Bolshevism; until that time there floated only a free and unconscious mob ready to follow any strong man.

The Bolsheviks carried the trade-mark of disorder and were precise and definite in their desire to murder and destroy. They always did everything they said they would do and this was their strength as leaders of a mass which could not remain unmastered. These leaders, though often basing everything on immoral and criminal desires, succeeded very easily in taking into their hands the whole of Russia because they represented the autocracy of the mob. Had I not seen the development of all these horrible events in Russia, had I not known many Bolsheviks and people who played rôles in this development of anarchy, probably I, like many foreigners or even Russians who have made a paying job out of the salvation of their country, would not have been able to see things in their true light. The five months I passed in prison gave me the opportunity of getting nearer to the Russian people themselves and of understanding their strange psychology.

The story told by the author is one of sinister significance so far as Colonel Robins is concerned. Robins knew that Kalpaschnikoff was under suspicion and even that the order had been issued for his arrest. He knew that the American Embassy was compromised, but he conveyed no warning. On the contrary he seems to have acted as the agent of the Bolsheviks:

Therefore, if Colonel Robins had heard that I was an agent of the counter revolutionists hiding behind the American flag and he wanted to be loyal to the American Embassy, his duty was to warn the ambassador, because if I were arrested at a time when I was working in such close contact with the embassy, it would compromise it most seriously in the eyes of the Russian people and make them believe that America was meddling in their internal politics.

It also seemed strange that when the American ambassador refused to deal with the Bolsheviks and considered them a gang of murderers, a man wearing the American Red Cross uniform could be sufficiently close to their leaders to share their secrets. All this puzzled me very much. While I was thinking it over, the words of my chauffeur, Kuznetsov, whom I had loaned to Colonel Robins, came back to me: "Be careful with this American. He has been motoring too often to the headquarters of the Bolshevik party both before and after it came into power."

I decided to see this matter through, and as Major Perkins was leaving the same night for America, through Siberia, I asked him to make me a signed statement of his conversation with Colonel Robins, which he did. When I took Major Perkins to the station, he left me with the words: "I am sorry to leave you at such a moment because I am afraid that Robins is trying to get you into trouble."

The author was arrested on a charge of plotting with Kaledin for the destruction of the revolution. He had an interview in prison with Prince Dolgoruky and Tereshenko and expressed his opinion of Robins. He said he would certainly do his best to let the American people know how some of the American Red Cross men acted in Russia, and how they mixed in politics instead of doing the work for which they had been sent:

Then he continued: "The idea of sending a Red Cross mission to Russia was certainly a good one and we all appreciated the generosity of the American people when Colonel Billings told us of his plans for relief work all over Russia. He was not only a splendid man of the highest character, but also an energetic worker and a specialist in medical organization on a large scale. But when he left and handed over everything to Colonel W. B. Thompson and Colonel Raymond Robins, things were quite different and the American Red Cross became the centre of personal and political intrigue. Thompson's friends and agents spread the report that he had paid all the expenses of the mission and that he had the right to do whatever he pleased. He produced on me the impression of a broker or business man buying pictures and other valuable things on the market through Russia's misfortunes, rather than a relief worker. I shall never forget the scandal he made in one of the sections of the Ministry of Finance when he asked for a certificate to send off a hundred cases of his pictures and things to America as official baggage and therefore free from duty."

"And what do you think of Robins?" I asked. Tereshenko looked at me and said: "I consider that this man has done more harm than anybody to the American cause in Russia. I knew that he was an extreme radical, that his sympathies were on the side of the enemies of the Provisional Government, and when I saw him take such a keen interest in politics and have conversations and conferences, not only with the Socialists, but also with the Bolsheviks, I came to the conclusion that he ought to be watched. A few days after I made this decision I informed the American ambassador that Colonel Raymond Robins was not only pro-Bolshevik, but seemed also to take too active a part in politics which might discredit the American Embassy and I requested the ambassador to give his attention to the matter."

The author gives us an unpleasant account of Kerensky, who, he says, aped the manners of royalty and demanded the reverence that was once paid to the Czar. When Beletsky of the old régime was imprisoned Kerensky came to see him and to wreak his vengeance upon him for slighting words that Beletsky had once used toward the now all-powerful minister:

He then turned to the chief of the fortress, a little red-haired officer, and told him to punish Beletsky for the public insult he had given him by putting him in a dark cell. The officer saluted, clicked his heels respectfully, and asked for how many hours this punishment was to be imposed on Beletsky.

"Three days," was the short answer. These words echoed through the dark corridors as Kerensky walked away toward another cell to finish his inspection of the fortress.

"Three days!" exclaimed all the guards in utter amazement.

In order to understand the astonishment of the guards it is necessary to describe the dark cell and to explain the rôle it played in the history of the fortress so that the reader will know why Beletsky, who was a strong, middle-aged man, full of life and energy, came out of it with white hair and the walk of a sick man. I had an opportunity later to inspect this "living tomb" myself and was one of the last to see Beletsky before he was taken out of the fortress and transferred to Moscow, where he was shot by the Bolsheviks at the end of March, 1918. He made the following statement concerning the dark cell:

"I suffered more in those three days than in all the long months of my captivity since the beginning of the Revolution."

The dark cell was situated at the end of the second corridor of the Truhetsky Bastillon and was quite separated from the others. The outside door, which was made of solid iron and shut absolutely tight like a gigantic safe, led into a small dark entry of about three feet square, in the ceiling of which was a small electric light with a few holes around it to give air from above. The foul air was almost suffocating and was heavy with dampness. A second iron door led into the cell itself, which was about five feet square. A bed and a nail on which to hang clothes were the only furnishings of this uncomfortable spot. The walls were also made of iron and the dampness was so great that there were big green patches of rust on them and drops of water could be seen here and there. It was so arranged that no light or sound could penetrate. Even the noon cannon which shook the whole fortress could not be heard here. The door, and the place where originally a window was supposed to be, were closed by big safe-like doors which were padded on the inside as an extra precaution. The only air came through a few little holes made over the door into the ante-room, which was also dark and only ventilated through an air tube and by a few small holes in the ceiling.

The author made friends with Purishkevich, one of his fellow-prisoners and whom he suspected of complicity in the killing of Rasputin. Purishkevich gave him an account of the funeral of the unsavory priest:

The body of Rasputin was found in the river and the story of his funeral is little known in Russia or elsewhere. It was told to me by an eye-witness. The Russian Red Cross Headquarters in Petrograd had put a car at my disposal and had sent with it a chauffeur named Vasily. He was a very dirty, badly dressed individual who drove recklessly and talked incessantly and had not been with me more than three days before he told me his "secret," which was that he had driven the Red Cross Emergency Ambulance which took the body of Rasputin from the Islands to Tzarskoe Selo. He gave me a curious description of the funeral of this mysterious creature and had genius of the court for so many years.

Vasily said he was on duty one day when an ambulance was summoned in a hurry by the Department of the Secret Police. He rushed to Small Fontanka Street, where the head detective, Philipov, and several policemen got in and ordered him to drive to the Islands. When he had crossed the bridge just behind the Ielagin Palace (the summer residence of the prime minister) he was to turn to the left and stop. It was a cold winter's day and Vasily tried to warm his hands over the radiator while he waited, for the frost was biting hard. Soon a body was brought out and he recognized Rasputin. The corpse looked horrible. It was all frozen. One bare foot stuck out from under the cover, the matted black hair was all plastered over his mutilated face, and the wide-open eyes were popping out of their sockets.

One of the policemen ordered "To Tzarskoe Selo," as the ambulance doors swung shut. Tzarskoe Selo is where the emperor and most of the smart society of Petrograd lived and is a drive of nearly two hours by motor. Vasily tried to find out as much as possible from the policeman sitting beside him, but the man was not very anxious to give any details. Nevertheless he learned that the body of Rasputin had been found in the canal owing to one of his boots having stuck in the railing of the bridge over which the murderers had thrown him, and that the body was now being taken to Tzarskoe Selo at the request of Anna Viruhova, who wanted to bury her friend. Vasily asked if it was true that Purishkevich was one of the murderers. The detective said it was, but it was impossible to touch him because a grand duke and another highly placed nobleman were also implicated.

At last they reached Tzarskoe Selo and the ambulance stopped in front of a small gray house. Vasily and two of the policemen carried in the body. It hardly had been deposited on a high table when Mme. Anna Viruhova appeared and a curious scene took place. She threw herself on the remains of the monk with loud sobs and began to kiss his mutilated head. (It was evident that he had received a shot full in the face at very close range, for it was entirely disfigured.) Mme. Viruhova's despair was so great that she did not seem to notice any one and continued kissing Rasputin and calling to him in most endearing terms, repeating now and then between her sobs: "They have killed a saint."

An inquiry into the guilt of the prisoners was eventually held. It was a summary proceeding and might easily mean instant death. Probably it would have meant instant death but for the sudden recall to Moscow of the commissioner, Derzhinsky. The author describes the passage from his prison cell:

On the other side of the yard, which looked very gloomy and dirty under the lead-colored sky of Petrograd, were still lying, near a pile of firewood, the bodies of two men and a woman. One man had fallen face down and a long thin stream of blood had worked its way from his mouth toward the gutter. This horrible scene gave a vivid picture of the Chrezvychaika murderers. The death of these three unfortunate beings was, I learned, the result of an "inquiry" of Derzhinsky which took place half an hour before Purishkevich and I were brought in. No one could give me any reason for their execution. One Red Guard shrugged his shoulders when I asked and calmly said:

"We bring so many of them to be shot every night that even the commission often gets mixed, but it does not matter, these people are all enemies of the Bolshevik Comrades, which is already sufficient reason for our lawful vengeance."

On being ordered back to prison there was some difficulty with the chauffeur, who had to remove the dead bodies and objected to a double journey. The difficulty was finally overcome by carrying the dead and living together:

Every one agreed, and the Red Guards went to fetch the bodies, which they dragged by the legs and flung into the car, and then we all climbed in. It was a ghastly scene. We were packed in; the Red Guards sat on the floor around the mutilated bodies, all except the one who had spoken to me, who sat on them.

The younger man, who might have been a lad of twenty, had a bullet in his throat, but his face seemed calm and serene and bore no trace of suffering. He was cleanly dressed in a military overcoat and must have been an officer. The other man's body lay nearer to me. He was much older and the expression which was frozen on his face was terrible and difficult to describe. It expressed fear, desperation, and great suffering. I have seen thousands of soldiers killed at the front, but I have never seen the face of a dead man so awful. Its image remained in my mind many days afterward—it was so horrible, with the blood coming out of his mouth. As for the woman, who was quite young, she had received all the bullets in the stomach and probably had suffered much before dying because she was all bent forward.

We all sat silent while our motor tore through the deserted streets of Petrograd. One man yawned and lighted a cigarette, saying that he was very tired, to which another added that it was not astonishing. Then, lifting the hand of the older man, the guard put his hand into the side pocket and not finding anything in it said: "It's a pity—nothing—these bourgeois usually have knickknacks on them, but this one is probably poor. The bourgeoisie are nearly all poor now."

The author was left in doubt for five months as to his fate and even as to the animus which kept him a prisoner:

With me it was quite different. No progress was made in my case, and as the days passed it seemed as though some dark hand was working against me. After my transfer to the Predvorilka it was strictly forbidden to give any information about me even to my family. As I sat in the dirty stuffy little cell I wondered what could be the reason. Trotsky had called me, in one of his speeches: "The black hand which pressed on the English police to have the honest Bolsheviks arrested on their way home." Could it be his personal vengeance? It is true that when I returned from America in 1917, Trotsky was on the Christianiafjord and when the ship came to Halifax the English police, suspecting that there might be among the emigrants some German agents disguised as Bolsheviks, decided to verify carefully the identity of the Russian emigrants. Many of them scarcely spoke any English and some one had to interpret. I was the only government official and the commander of the port asked me to help him, which I did willingly. Among the many emigrants questioned in my presence was Trotsky. The next day the English police came and took him off the boat. It was a beautiful spring morning, the sea was calm, and when a big launch full of armed sailors came alongside we all rushed on deck to see what was going to happen. A few minutes later Trotsky and several others were brought out. He protested and kicked, but was carried down by big strapping seamen who did their work calmly and methodically. As the boat moved away Trotsky shook his fist at the English officers and cursed England.

The author believes that the attitude of the rest of the world is largely responsible for Bolshevism. The Reds were allowed to seize the helm and Russia was further outraged by the callous partition of her territories and by the grant of independence to Latvia, Estonia, Azerbaijan, Georgia, Ukraine, Lithuania, and the Baltic provinces:

Many people consider the Russian situation very complicated. I do not think I am exaggerating when I say that the whole world is preoccupied by the thought of what is going to happen next in Russia. I do not want to claim to be a prophet, but my fortress experiences have taught me, not only to understand the past better, but to realize some of the possibilities of the future. I can state in the first place that nothing which has occurred astonished me. The revolutionary sickness is going on normally, therefore it is easy to predict coming events. The Communist organization of the Soviet government has proved to be only a dream which can not be practically realized. Bolshevism in Russia is only a part of the revolutionary anarchy and can be divided into two periods: (a) that of the decay and destruction of the army, which I call the period of the German agents; (b) that of the Red Terror, which I call the period of the historical vengeance of the oppressed in general and of the Jews in particular. But, as the progress of the one hundred and fifty million pure Russians could not be stopped, the third period, which is the evolution of the Revolution, has begun. Then the Bolsheviks, to save themselves at least for a time, were obliged to let the wave of patriotism rise; though they know it will eventually wash them out they are helpless and can do nothing except follow the current. The Soviet government, by restoring the discipline in the new armies, is digging its own grave.

The author believes that Russia has been saved and that her agony is nearly over. So may it be, although there will be some well-founded doubts. But there will be no doubts about the value of a book which confines itself so closely to personal experiences.

BANKING AND INVESTMENT NEWS.

San Francisco's bank clearings for the week ending June 26, 1920, were $155,300,000; for the corresponding week of 1919, $123,200,000; a gain of $32,200,000.

Total gold reserves of the Federal Reserve Bank of San Francisco increased during the week ending June 25th over the previous week by $8,545,000 to $180,758,000, according to the bank's weekly statement issued Saturday. Gold held by member banks gained $11,373,000 to $59,854,000, while bills on hand rose $9,628,000 to $180,705,000. Total earning assets showed a decrease of $317,000 and resources were higher by $2,841,000, to $418,135,000.

trust certificates—one of the highest types of investment—to net the investor 7 per cent., and with the Pennsylvania bringing out well-secured ten-year bonds to return as much, the investors who follows the long swings in interest rates is beginning to wonder if it is not high time to begin buying long-term fixed-interest-bearing securities (says the World's Work). This scientific investor, who, if he was fortunate, sold his long-term bonds around the opening of the present century, when New York Central 3½s were as high as 111½, and has kept his funds in short-term securities since, wonders if it is not time to switch back again when New York Central 3½s are at 63.

vestor has enjoyed over those who held on to their long-term bonds throughout the past two decades is self evident. If he made no profits at all on the short-term securities which he bought to keep his funds in liquid or quickly available shape, yet he can now, with the amount of his original investment in hand, buy nearly twice as many New York Central 3½s as he then held. In the case of all long-term bonds which were outstanding twenty years ago the situation is the same, unless there has been improvement in the security back of the bonds to offset the effect of steadily advancing interest rates. Chicago and Northwestern general mortgage 3½s due 1987, for instance, sold as high as 111 in 1901. They are now 60.

Whether the bottom has been reached in this long decline in bonds remains to be seen. As long as Liberty Bonds suffer periodical spells of market weakness, other bonds can not be expected to start upward. The comparison with Liberty Bonds at prices to yield more than 6 per cent. for some issues is not favorable for advancing prices among the corporation bonds. Probably the first indication of the swing in the other direction will come in the Liberty Loan issues. These are the bonds to which a reviving demand for sound investments will turn first. In the change from the present period of speculation to one of conservatism and caution the safest kind of investment will be the one first sought. So Liberty Bonds will probably give the first indication of a downward swing of interest rates. But when the exact moment will arrive that bonds will start to regain some of the loss in price of the past two decades is not of great importance. The shrewd investor, who takes advantage of these long swings to increase the principal of his investments—or avoids them, as has been the case in the past, twenty years, to keep from suffering losses—is not concerned with the exact time that the pendulum starts to swing back. All he wants to know is whether it is near the end of an oscillation. If he takes advantage of movements which cover decades, it is not necessary to get in and out at the extreme ends of the movement. The point about which he is concerned is whether we are now near the end of such a movement.

To answer this, one must look to the causes that have brought about the advance in interest rates that has resulted in such severe declines in long-term bond prices. The most important immediate reason for this advance has been the decline in the purchasing power of the interest return. In other words, prices of long-term bonds have gone down because the cost of living has gone up. As living expenses advanced those who had money to lend demanded a higher return for it. That meant that new bond issues had to offer higher interest rates as an inducement to attract capital. And bonds already outstanding had to meet the competition in the market of these new issues at higher rates. That is why New York Central 3½s, Chicago and Northwestern 3½s, and other high-grade bonds have fallen from 111 to around 60. There has been other contributing causes, but they are more or less related to the cost of living. Lately, also, the income tax has had a very noticeable influence in reducing the amount of capital available for investment in corporation bonds. In fact, there has been a switching on the part of very rich men from investments in corporation bonds to such tax-exempt securities. The present price for the first Liberty Loan 3½ per cent. bonds of seven points above some of the 4½ per cent. issues is due to the fact that the first issue is exempt from all income tax, while the later issues, above certain amounts, are subject to the sur-taxes, with the exception of the Victory Loan 3½s.

All these factors must be taken into account in considering the outlook for prices of long-term corporation bonds in the years ahead, but the most important one is the purchasing power that the interest return on these bonds is likely to have in the future. If the cost of living is coming down, then there will be a greater demand for long-term bonds because the fixed interest return that they will give over a period of years will buy a steadily growing amount of food and clothing and other commodities. And as the interest return buys more and the demand for such bonds grows, they will advance in price. If the rates of the income sur-taxes are lowered, that will increase the supply of investment capital and reduce the advantage of holding tax-exempt securities as compared with these corporation issues. If the world's gold production continues to show a declining ratio of increase as it has since 1915, that should have an influence in enhancing the value of bonds that are payable in gold. And furthermore there is the precedent to take into consideration for what it is worth that after previous wars fixed interest-bearing securities of the higher grades have advanced in value.

For some time past financial doctors whose business it is to study these matters in connection with the investment of funds in their charge have expressed the opinion that those who would switch from short-term investments into long-term bonds would, in the long run, have very little cause for regret. It is possible that they did not give enough weight to the effect that the income tax is having or to the other causes that have resulted in the dumping of large amounts of Liberty Bonds on the market. At any rate, since this opinion was first expressed by able financial experts there has been a further decline in the best grade long-term bonds of another ten points. If their opinion that in the long run those who purchased long-term bonds at ten points above their present levels would not regret it was sound, then their advice in this particular should be of more value to the investor today. He can not expect to get in at the very bottom; for unless Liberty Bonds, by leading the upward movement, give an indication that the turn is at hand there will be no way of telling until afterward when the real upturn starts. But when one compares present prices for the highest grade railroad bonds with the high levels at which they have sold in the past the possibilities for improvement seem enormous. These present levels are very close to the recent low record prices touched by these bonds:

Interest Rate.	Date Due.	High Since 1900.	Present Price.
Atch. T.&S.F. gen. mtg. 4	1995	106	70½
Chic.&N.W. gen. mtg. 3½	1987	111	60
New York Central ref. 3½	1997	111½	63
Nor.&West. 1st consol. 4	1996	104½	81½
Nor. Pacific prior lien. 4	1997	106¾	69½

Union Pacific 1st mtg. 4	1947	108¾	74½

Average price107¾ 69½

Some of these bonds were not outstanding when the New York Central and Chicago and Northwestern 3½s were selling at 111. The Pennsylvania consolidated 4s, for instance, were issued in 1903. The high record for them, and for some of the other issues, therefore, was made after interest rates had advanced considerably from the low levels of 1900 and 1901. The present selling prices of these Pennsylvania bonds and of the Union Pacific first mortgage 4s are higher than for the others because of their earlier maturity date when they will be paid off at par. For the investor who wishes to take advantage of the long swing in interest rates, bonds having the longer maturities are the ones that hold out the greatest possibilities for increasing his principal, provided the expected swing back in interest rates materializes.

The Anglo bond book has been mailed to the clients of the bond department of the Anglo and London Paris National Bank. This is a very attractively prepared booklet of sixteen pages, containing descriptions and prices of all the bonds at present being offered by the Anglo and London Paris National's bond department. There is also a great deal of up-to-the-minute material on present conditions in the bond market.

With the present condition of the market dull and reputed to be in the hands of professionals, many along the Street have taken the attitude of watchful waiting. In spite of this bearishness older and more experienced investors are looking for a marked change in the next few weeks. Now is the time to obtain stocks at their low prices, which will advance when the market takes its rise in the summer or fall. That an upward trend is certain can easily be adjudged from comparison with similar periods preceding each presidential election.

There has been the same irregular market, followed by the same lull the market is experiencing at the present time. July is usually the month the rally occurs, and a steady upward movement then continues for several months. Periods covering the last five presidential years show the season of advance to be as follows: 1900, September to December, McKinley; 1904, July to November, Roosevelt; 1908, July to November, Taft; 1912, July to September, Wilson; 1916, July to November, Wilson.

A chart of leading stocks indicates conditions today approximately the same as during the like period in 1916, and from the steady accumulation during May and June, with a gradual upward trend by these leaders, it is predicted that the next month will see a sharp advance in the entire market.

From a high point last year at which time brokers' loans had reached a total of $1,500,000,000 the deflation in the stock market has continued steadily for eight months, until a 50 per cent. reduction in loans had been accomplished. We therefore must reach the conclusion, after a most careful analysis, that the stock market is now thoroughly liquidated. The commodity market, however, has yet at least six more months of deflation facing it. The same relative reduction in commodity loans will perhaps have been accomplished by the end of the current year. Bankers throughout the country are determined to do their share in attacking the high cost of living. The reduction of commodity loans is their contribution toward this muchly desired end. These activities in connection with the stock market may produce a "bull market" during the next four months, as it will be necessary to keep idle money active and the "call loan" is the ideal loan at present. Millions of dollars will be sent to New York City to be loaned on "call" while the deflation in "time loans" continues throughout the country.

The liquidation of the stock market has been so complete that stocks now rest securely in strong hands. The same people who sold stocks last November at the peak of the bull market have replaced their holdings. Beginning in July you will see an upward trend in the stock market. Such market leaders as Mexican Petroleum, Crucible, Baldwin, Pan-American, United States Steel, Republic Steel, Bethlehem Steel, and Vanadium will begin to strengthen, the minor stocks able developments. The bearish interests, of course, attempted to argue that Wall Street was disheartened at the result, but the course of the market in the near future will show quite the contrary, especially as prices generally are low enough to permit a very good advance despite other complications in the situation.

The process of deflating some of our credit balloons has been going on and the headway made will be more apparent later on when crop-moving demands are not so insistent.

The general labor situation continues bothersome. The public is mightily interested in the proposition involved in the open-shop question. The unions have assumed a high and mighty attitude of late, and it may be just as well if the whole issue comes to a head. Some of the stocks naturally affected have been selling pretty low in the market and any real settlement of the trouble should be at once reflected in local issues.

There has been considerable heaviness in some of the old-line standard railway issues of late due to ignorance as to what the Interstate Commerce Commission will decide regarding rate cases. As the roads will be traveling "on their own" after the government guarantee expires September 1st, it is natural that where earnings are not favorable as strong a treasury position as possible should be maintained. Intrinsic values of these standard stocks, however, are not affected in the least by current stock market fluctuations. The Interstate Commerce Commission appraisers have already set values on the different railroad properties which would make their common stocks look like great bargains even at levels higher than they have reached in recent years.

A considerable steel merger has taken place at Wheeling, and there are still hints of one of larger interest that would affect certain popular listed stocks. Bethlehem Steel is spoken of again and again in connection with some merger deal. It requires no merger, however, to suggest Bethlehem securities as susceptible of favorable market operations from anything like current levels. The common stock has a hook value of more than double what it is selling for. In the chemical trade another merger is brewing. Meanwhile the stocks that are likely to be subject of stock dividends have at times been quite strong. Suggested mergers and melons are not hush ammunition except where the inside market conditions are ripe, which in the circumstances seems rather suggestive of possibilities in the market which the hull manipulators have not as yet fully probed.

The investment market is absorbing equipment trust offerings in a manner to suggest that hopes for a sustained buying movement by the railroads will be realized. This is causing quiet confidence in the steel trade generally. Production is increasing, and it only remains for the general traffic situation to become normal to bring about a decided boom in the steel business generally.

Copper seems to be moving abroad now a little more freely than it has been for some time, and as our leading interests arrange the matters of credits and exchanges this movement should grow in volume. The very long unfavorable road which the copper trade has been traveling seems to have turned. Prices for the metal are quite low if production costs are considered.

The sensational decline in silver is likely to be followed by some orderly improvement. The wiping out of speculative accounts in London and the current unfavorable trade conditions in the Orient seem to have been pretty well discounted by the slump that has been suffered in the market for the white metal, which, it must be admitted, will always be in demand, while current production is anything but large.

McDonnell & Co. announce the removal of their main office to Market Street at New Montgomery in the Palace Hotel, where a commission and investment business will be conducted in all its branches. Here they have one of the finest, best equipped, and most conveniently arranged quarters for the investment business in the country.

June is often a month of erratic and at times very hearish market tendencies. There is a sharp demand for funds this month in connection with the tax and government bond interest payments and in general for mid-year settlements, but on the whole the outlook for money is reasonably satisfactory, especially as freight is moving with greater facility and releasing with proportionate rapidity the congestion of credits.

The market as a whole has recently been through a period of most drastic liquidation, and it now looks as if there is a sufficiently large investment public that is acquainted with the bargain valuations now presented by the stock market list to absorb such offerings as may be made from time to time by weak holders or by the bear crowd.

In passing it may be stated that the bear element is quite as fixed in its opinions now as it was at any time earlier in the year and can see nothing good ahead which would lend an assurance of profit to those who might be brave enough to huy. It seems, however, that the difficulties that have beset the market are gradually dissolving. The Interstate Commerce Commission is arranging to provide funds for a large equipment-huying programme and, as the world generally is short of things that are prerequisite to efficiency in transportation, it looks as if the stocks of the good equipment companies will be more and more in demand and will enjoy at times this year periods of great hullishness.

The Mercantile Marine report for last year was very interesting, showing a net result, after all taxes and interest and other expenses, including a much larger depreciation fund than last year, of over $17,000,000, which, in turn, was nearly half again as much as the same account for 1918. The net earnings for the two years amounted to close to $60 per share on the preferred stock, these earnings, of course, being inclusive of the earnings of the subsidiary British lines. There should be another payment in the fall on account of the large arrearage of preferred dividends, and indeed the company is in position to pay up all these dividends at any time it might deem it advisable, though, of course, the sterling exchange situation would entail a loss in bringing funds from England.

The Blankenhorn-Hunter-Dulin Company and the Anglo London and Paris National Bank are offering an issue of $750,000 James Irrigation District (Fresno County) 6 per cent. serial gold bonds, due January 1, 1928 to 1942 inclusive.

The James Irrigation District is comprised of 26,648 productive acres, located twenty-four miles southwest of the City of Fresno. The actual value of the net acreage within this district is appraised at $3,916,155, or $150 per acre.

These bonds are a legal investment in California for savings banks, commercial banks, trust companies, trust funds, insurance companies, school funds, and are valuable to secure public deposits. They are totally tax exempt in California and exempt from the Federal income tax and are being offered at prices to yield 6.20 per cent.

On July 1st interest on many bond issues, on mortgages, and on savings accounts was payable. Also many loans came due and were paid. This date is therefore one of the great investment days of the year.

The bond department of the Anglo and London Paris National Bank owns and offers a wide range of investment bonds of the soundest security and the highest rates of interest possible with absolute safety.

The Anglo Bond Book, recently published, containing descriptions of all the bank's offerings, will be mailed upon application.

The thirty-sixth annual report of the Southern Pacific Company to its 39,460 stockholders, as given by Julius Kruttschnitt, chairman of the executive committee, for the year ended December 31, 1919, was made public here June 24th by President William Sproule, and hears eloquent testimony to the shrinkage of the railroad dollar.

With the largest railway operating revenues in the company's history, amounting to over $239,000,000, an increase of $18,000,000 over 1918, railway operating expenses soared to almost $187,000,000, an increase of over $24,000,000. Net revenue from railway operations fell off six millions of dollars and the government failed by over four million dol lars to equal the standard return guaranteed the company. Following is a summary of operating revenues, operating expenses, and net revenue from railway operations for the years 1919 and 1918 under Federal control, also, for comparative purposes, for the year 1917, the last year of private operation preceding government control:

Operating revenues—1919, $239,657,272.35; 1918, $221,611,206.21; 1917, $193,971,489.54.

Operating expenses—1919, $186,927,482.51; 1918, $162,722,371.84; 1917, $120,601,822.82.

Net revenue from railway operations—1919, $52,729,789.84; 1918, $58,888,834.37; 1917, $73,369,666.72.

Operating ratio—1919, 78 per cent.; 1918, 73.43 per cent.; 1917, 62.18 per cent.

The above figures illustrate the disproportionate increase in expenses compared with revenues and the fall in net despite higher gross. In 1919, after paying expenses of operating, there was left out of each dollar of revenue only 22 cents, compared with 38 cents remaining in the last year previous to Federal control.

Comparing 1919 with 1918, the increase in operating revenue of $18,046,066.14, or 8.14 per cent., resulted principally from the fact that passenger and freight rates were not increased until June of 1918 and the beneficial effect of this increase was felt in only half of that year.

There was a decrease of 6.52 per cent. in ton miles of revenue freight, attributed chiefly to the diversion of traffic from the company's lines during the whole of last year, which was practiced during only a part of the preceding year. This diversion of traffic during the operation of the company's lines by the government resulted from the closing of traffic agencies, the disturbance of relationship of both rates and service, and arbitrary routing of freight by governmental agencies.

The revenue passengers carried one mile increased 7.28 per cent., which partially offset the decrease in the volume of freight business and was due to the transportation of discharged and furloughed soldiers and to the general prosperity of the people of the country.

The increase of $24,205,110.67, or 14.88 per cent., in operating expenses, compared with a decrease of 5.71 per cent. in train mileage, was due principally to additional increases in wages and prices of material, the effect of these increases over previous year being:

Increased wages$11,420,000
Increase in price of fuel..... 2,534,500
Increase in prices of other materials... 4,879,000

Total increase$18,833,500

The annual report showed increases in 1918 over 1917 from these causes of $34,338,000, the total increase in wages and material prices in the two years of Federal control, therefore, being $53,171,000, increasing operating expenses substantially 40 per cent.

There was an increase of $5,371,611 in operating expenses in 1919 over 1918 not accounted for by increase wages or prices.

To replace equipment vacated and to provide for increased requirements the company has placed orders with outside concerns for 42 locomotives, 50 passenger-train cars, 750 freight-train cars, and 130 electric cars; and is building at company shops 30 locomotives and 4065 freight-train cars. Orders have been placed, also, for three ocean-going freight steamers—El Estero, El Islee, and El Lago—of 7825 tons displacement each, and one ocean-going tank steamer—Tamihua—of 22,900 tons displacement. The cost of this new rolling stock and floating equipment will be approximately $29,700,000, all of which, except the cost of the steamers, it is proposed to provide by means of an equipment trust.

Mr. A. Carnegie Ross, British consul-general, San Francisco, informs the Argonaut that he has just received a copy of the latest issue of the Scottish Trade Courier, which is on file in the reference library of this consulate-general, where it is available to all those who may be interested in this district.

Exempt from Federal and local taxes and yielding 6 1/4 per cent., the Freeman, Smith & Camp Company is offering $192,000 Cordua Irrigation District gold 6 per cent. bonds in denominations of $1000.

The bonds constitute a tax lien on 6122 acres of productive farm lands, situated in Yuba County about five miles northeast of Marysville. Grain and rice, the principal crops at present, are being replaced by alfalfa, and olive, prune, and fig orchards. All the land in the district has been under cultivation for many years and about 2000 acres have been irrigated continuously since 1913. This is in no sense a construction proposition, as the system has been entirely completed and is in successful operation. Lands in the district have been readily salable for some years for $75 per acre without water, and are estimated conservatively to be worth in excess of $125 per acre now that irrigation water is available. The average annual tax for in-

The French Revolution.

This substantial volume by Mrs. Nesta H. Webster tries to present to us the French Revolution in a new light. It was not, she tells us, the dawning of a French democracy. At least it was not so intended. It had, in fact, no popular basis, even though it resulted in a popular superstructure. It was the result of a combination of plots, some of them dynastic, some of them Prussian, some of them today we might call Bolshevik and directed alike against France and England. These various forces played upon the discontent of the French people, duped into the belief that they were saving themselves, but actually the tools of parties who had no democratic interests, but were selfish, monarchial, or reactionary.

Mrs. Webster is probably right, and this may be said, not alone because of the facts that she cites, but because there has never been a truly democratic movement in the world. Mrs. Webster speaks of the "amazing credulity" of the French people, but was their credulity more amazing than popular credulity has always been? Was it even more general? Revolutions, however democratic they may seem to be, have invariably centered around the persons of leaders who have just as invariably been swayed by their own ambitions and have sought to seize and to hold an even greater power than that of those against whom they have struggled. There is no such tyranny in the world as that of the democratic revolutionary leader, no slavery so abject as that of those whom he leads. Here in America we know something of the cost in freedom of a world made "safe for democracy," of the tyrannies exercised by democratic leaders. France exchanged a Louis XVI for a Robespierre. Russia has exchanged a Czar for a Lenin. Men are as ready today as they were two hundred years ago to grovel before the "idealist," indifferent to the whip in his hand. And the "idealist" falls a ready prey to the astute reactionaries who use him to their own ends. Robespierre, Danton, Napoleon, a rampant Caesarism and the Commune were the price that France had to pay for such ameliorations as the revolution brought her. Was the price too high?

Mrs. Webster's book is eminently worth reading. It is based on research and erudition. At the least it tells us something of the philosophy of revolutions, something that we ought to learn.

THE FRENCH REVOLUTION: A STUDY IN DEMOCRACY. By Nesta H. Webster. New York: E. P. Dutton & Co.; $8.

Why Men Strike.

One is inclined to believe that Mr. Crowther has written a large book in order to explain the evident. The cause that underlies the combinations of labor is the same cause that underlies the combinations of capital. The cause is the desire for advantage, and the mechanism of operation is coercion and force. The same factors operate elsewhere in the production of wars. Neither strikes nor lock-outs nor wars are likely to cease so long as greed and the desire to dominate are the guiding principles of human life. They will not be banished either by economic changes or by leagues of nations.

Mr. Crowther would abolish labor unrest by the inculcation of thrift. Thrift, it seems, is spending a little less than you earn, a truism once graphically expressed by Mr. Micawber. If the money thus saved were invested the laborer would then have a "stake in the country." He would become a capitalist. His interests would lie in the direction of stability. He would be vitally concerned with the increase of production. Class antagonisms would disappear because there would be only one class. But thrift must not be confused with penuriousness, it must not involve privation. It must be regarded as a sagacious increase of capital and therefore of productive power.

This, of course, is all true enough. If human nature were fundamentally different we should doubtless have a fundamentally different world. But how shall we change human nature?

WHY MEN STRIKE. By Samuel Crowther. New York: Doubleday, Page & Co.; $1.75.

Parliament and Revolution.

Mr. Ramsay MacDonald believes that only socialism can save England, and he writes this book in order to discuss the ways in which socialism can be established. He does not believe in violent revolution. Why shed blood, he seems to ask, while we have a supreme Parliament and the right to elect any one we please to that Parliament? He is aware, he says, that democratic majorities are actually elected by capitalist minorities, which seems to be a rather bitter comment on democratic intelligence, but this implies no censure of the parliamentary system. The mechanism, and an effective one, is there ready to hand. The blame for its failure must be laid on the mechanic and not on the machine.

Mr. MacDonald wants no sovietism, which he says is a pure aristocracy without democratic features. He tells us that "only a low state of political interest will tolerate this system of government." The parliamentary system is fully qualified to do whatever is to be done. It has supreme power. All that is needed is that the people shall elect the right men. And that, we may tell Mr. MacDonald, is what the people are constitutionally and temperamentally incapable of doing.

PARLIAMENT AND REVOLUTION. By J. Ramsay MacDonald. New York: Scott & Selzer.

Prison Sonnets.

The author, now professor of philosophy at Princeton University, enlisted in the British army and was taken prisoner during the great March offensive. These poems were composed during his captivity, a labor, he says, that "stood between my soul and madness." The first part of the book is a series of sonnets describing the author's war experiences before his capture, and the second part is devoted to meditative sonnets suggested by his unfortunate lot. All are of nearly faultless workmanship, but naturally reflective of the melancholy engendered by catastrophe and inaction.

SONNETS FROM A PRISON CAMP. By Archibald Allan Bowman. New York: John Lane Company; $1.50.

Gossip of Books and Authors.

"Personal Aspects of Jane Austen," which the Duttons are announcing, offers a new and wholly personal view of the famous English novelist. It is the work of Mary A. Austen-Leigh and gives glimpses of the development of Miss Austen from a little girl at her lessons to her last years, and also offers some comments on her ethics as revealed in her novels.

Warren G. Harding, the Republican nominee for President, was one of the early employers of Frederick O'Brien, author of "White Shadows in the South Seas," when Mr. O'Brien was tramping about the world and Mr. and Mrs. Harding were running a small paper in Marion, Ohio. Mr. O'Brien was on his way back across the country after having marched on Washington as a "General" in Coxey's army. He stepped out of a side-door sleeper somewhere in Ohio and first began selling hedges to the farmers. A murder trial in Marion attracted his attention, and he offered himself as a great crime reporter to Mr. Harding, proprietor of the Star. Mr. O'Brien says that at that time Mr. Harding solicited advertising and Mrs. Harding kept the books and distributed papers to the newsmen.

The credit for "discovery" of Hilda Conkling, the child poet, must be given to Miss Harriet Monroe, the editor of Poetry. In 1916 Miss Monroe received from Hilda's mother, Grace Hazard Conkling, a number of poems "made" by the little girl, then five years old. She at once recognized their unique quality. During the next three years at various intervals, thirty-seven of Hilda's poems appeared in the pages of Poetry, with other poems written by children under ten.

Leonard Merrick's novels are rapidly finding the large and appreciative audience they were bound to have in this country as soon as they should be adequately brought to the attention of American readers, and now his publishers, E. P. Dutton & Co., are bringing out a story by his wife, Hope Merrick, that will interest and charm those who have grown fond of his work as much as do his own books.

News has been received from Europe that Jacinto Benavente, the Spanish playwright, has been awarded the Nöbel prize for literature. The official public announcement of the award has not yet been made, but the Royal Spanish Academy has been informed in advance, with the request that it prepare a memorial for the occasion.

Basil Mathews, author of "The Argonauts of Faith," a noted English writer, needs no introduction to the American book-reading public. He has a half-dozen important titles to his credit on this side of the water, notably his recent "The Riddle of Nearer Asia" with an introduction by Viscount Bryce and his "Livingstone the Pathfinder," which has gone through many editions.

Seaside Schools for London Children.

Batches of London's children are to get their lessons at the seaside during the coming summer. The London County Council will open a boarding-school at Margate, to which the children will be sent for a six weeks' stay. The school is intended for children who are not strong enough to take full benefit of their lessons in London.

It has been proved at Bushey, where a similar school was opened last year, that even a month of open-air life and schooling makes all the difference possible to ailing children.

General William Booth.

It is strange that we should have waited so many years for a life of General Booth such as has now been given to us by Mr. Harold Begbie. It would have attracted widespread attention a few years ago. It may do so still, but the conditions are not now favorable. What may he called the dogmatic aspects of General Booth's religion are nearly as extinct as the worship of Juno. Doctrinal Christianity as he understood it can hardly be said to exist. The evangelical references that crowd his utterances seem already like some half-forgotten language. Just as the shadow of the war lies darkly between the old and the new politics, so it lies between the old and the new theologies, if indeed there can be said to be a new theology.

It is with William Booth the philanthropist that we are now most concerned. Mr. Begbie believes that he is "likely to remain for many centuries one of the most signal figures in human history." It is much to be doubted. Booth will never seem to be as great as Bunyan or Wesley. He is incomparable with St. Francis. The greatest religious figure-heads in the world's history have usually been mystics, and there was no mysticism in Booth. This is not the place to discuss the popular efficacies of mysticism, but it seems to be essential to a permanent place in human memory.

Mr. Begbie has done his work in the best possible way. We have learned to distrust the ordinary biography. It is about as truthful as an epitaph. But the biography that consists mainly or largely of letters stands on a different footing. Letters usually reflect the character of the writer, whereas the facts of a life can be arranged into almost any desired pattern. Mr. Begbie gives us a large measure of General Booth's letters, and they are singularly expressive of the mind and manners of their writer. They show a man on fire with compassion for the outcasts of the world and with that saving common sense that recognizes the needs of the physical as a basis for the spiritual. We feel that we are safe in Mr. Begbie's hands and that he is not building to a preconceived model. His first volume leaves us at the year 1881. The second and concluding volume is to appear speedily.

THE LIFE OF GENERAL WILLIAM BOOTH. By Harold Begbie. In two volumes. Volume I. New York: The Macmillan Company; $10.50.

The Six-Hour Shift.

Lord Leverhulme probably makes more money than any other man in the world. His factories are enormous and he employs an army of men and women. The industrial problem is therefore one of self-interest for Lord Leverhulme, and he finds that self-interest and philanthropy go hand in hand.

A six-hour day, says Lord Leverhulme, is beneficial alike to employers and employed. It means a maximum of efficiency and contentment and therefore an increase of profits. He advocates also a profit-sharing plan with the consequent raising of the workman to the status of an employer, but we have schemes of our own to the same end, and it is not new. The six-hour shift is new, and this record of Lord Leverhulme's experiences will be read with interest as the testimony of one who knows what he is saying and who is in no sense a visionary nor an idealist.

THE SIX-HOUR SHIFT AND INDUSTRIAL EFFICIENCY. By Lord Leverhulme. New York: Henry Holt & Co.

The Peace in the Making.

Already we have several books of personal impressions of the peace conference written by newspaper men who were competent enough to observe visible facts, but who had little of that comprehensive knowledge of men and affairs necessary to the arrangement and appraisal of those facts. The only exception that comes to our mind at the moment is Dr. Dillon's book.

Mr. H. Wilson Harris, author of "The Peace in the Making," gives us a narrative of the surface events that came to his notice. It has its value, and a distinct one, and it is in no way a disparagement to say that it has no judicial nor interpretive qualities. For example, Mr. Harris announces the dispatch to Petrograd of Bullitt and Steffens as though it were one of those salutary expedients dictated by the exigencies of the moment. But he seems to know nothing of the character or repute of either of these men, nor of the obvious fact that their mission was a white-washing one and was intended to be, and that it constituted a debasing act of surrender to Bolshevik arrogance. The same lack of analysis and interpretation pervades the book, which must be regarded as a personal rather than a political narrative.

THE PEACE IN THE MAKING. By H. Wilson Harris. New York: E. P. Dutton & Co.; $2.

Leonard Wood.

This little volume was evidently written for campaign purposes and may therefore he said to have lost some of its significance in view of recent events. But it has its value as a succinct narrative of the main facts in the life of General Wood set forth without futile attempts at character delineation. It contains some interesting illustrations.

Briefer Reviews.

A late addition to the Marden Inspirational Books is "You Can, But Will You?" by Orison Swett Marden (Thomas Y. Crowell Company). It is of the usual order.

Under the title of "Leader of Men," Robert Gordon Anderson has written a eulogy and appreciation of Theodore Roosevelt. It is published by G. P. Putnam's Sons. Price, $1.

The Stanton & Van Vliet Company, Chicago, has published "How to Use Concrete Construction for Town and Farm," by H. Colin Campbell, C. E. It includes formulas, drawing, and specific instruction to enable the reader to construct farm and town equipment.

The Century Company has published a booklet biography of Frederick O'Brien, author of "White Shadows in the South Seas," and will be glad to send the booklet free to any one who asks for it.

E. De Stein, author of "The Poets in Picardy" (E. P. Dutton & Co.; $2), says that the rhymes contained in his volume were all jotted down in France during 1916, 1917, and 1918, either in the trenches, in billets, or in the more dignified purloins of staff offices. Any merit that may be found in them is due, he says, to the influence of that wonderful spirit of light-heartedness that never seemed to desert the men with whom he happened to serve.

The Century Company has published "The Conquest of the Old Southwest," by Archibald Henderson. It was Mr. Henderson's original desire to write a biography of his boyhood hero, Daniel Boone, but while studying the famous scout's career he unearthed a veritable mine of material regarding the early pioneers and the whole movement of westward expansion in the eighteenth century. He became so engrossed in the significance of this movement and was so fascinated by the study of how the spirit of American democracy came to evolve under the grinding pressure of frontier conditions that he extended his original plan and instead of writing the biography of one pioneer he decided to record the history of the entire movement in the Southwest.

That the slang and idioms of today will be correct English tomorrow is the opinion of Professor H. Glicksman of the English department, University of Wisconsin. "Our language is made up of what was once slang, idiom, colloquialism, and jargon," he said lately, and warned that the only deplorable feature about slang was its tendency to produce mental slovenliness. Professor Glicksman then referred to the word "moh" as slang of 200 years ago and as such denounced in the Speculator by Addison. "It is an abbreviation of the word 'mobile.' Even so the word 'pep' is vital and virile and will survive with the word 'snappy.' But to gain recognition slang must be free from vulgarity and cheapness," said Professor Glicksman.

Freaks of Fame.

Who would have believed that the designer of the Washington monument and the Bunker Hill monument could keep his name from becoming a household word? To have planned either of these monoliths ought to be enough to insure the planner's fame; to have planned both of them would be to take a bond of fate. But how many of those who read the account in last Saturday's Evening Post of the career of Robert Mills could remember having heard his name? And what stranger irony could there be than that he owes his present fame to the circumstance that he has been nominated for a place in the Hall of Fame at University Heights? We are interested in him, not because he is famous, but because he ought to be famous. One is tempted to suggest a special section in the Hall of Fame, inscribed "Obscure Immortals."

Architects have always been ill treated by fame. Fickle towards everybody and everything else, the wilful goddess has been consistent in her indifference to those who endeavor to build material monuments more enduring than brass. To know a poem without being able to give the name of the author on demand is a disgrace, but to know who designed a famous monument is pedantic. It isn't done. Engravers are similarly neglected. So are composers of popular songs. Everybody can tell who wrote a musical masterpiece that lies untouched in the music rack, but to say who is the author of the air that we hum as we go about our work is beyond us. The fame of the mortal singer of an undying song may be far greater than that of the one who wrote the song. Jennie Lind's rendition of "Annie Laurie" is familiar history, but who except the compilers of reference books knows of William Douglas? In a desperate effort to compensate for this ignoring of some of those who should be her children, Fame, unlike lightning, sometimes strikes twice in the same place, as when she acknowledged Sir Walter Scott first as poet and then as novelist.—New York Tribune.

"WEDDING BELLS."

The endless list of light and smiling plays keeps merrily on. I note that the Curran announces three or four successors to "Wedding Bells," all, apparently, in a similar vein of light comedy, except "Linger Longer, Letty," which is evidently something in the line of musical comedy.

"Wedding Bells," by Salisbury Field, has for its motive the clearing up of the estrangement between a divorced pair who really love each other and who, with the characteristic impetuosity of the young married people that populate plays, have been separated through a mere quibble.

I have wondered sometimes whether it is the custom for lightweight people in real life to get divorces with anything like as little genuine reason for it as the people on the stage. It seems, judging from these Gaylyweds, as if they regarded divorce as a sort of happy reversion, and in their butterfly souls talk it like that. After they have taken it out on the offending partner the threatening clouds will pass away and clearly shines a second wedding day.

That these things don't work so smoothly as all that in real life has little to do with the fact that they do in plays of the "Wedding Bells" type, of which the atmosphere, as felt by the audience, is "Begone, dull care."

The main thing is to have an ingenious and amusing series of complications, witty and yet human dialogue, an ingratiating flavor of sentiment, and delightful people to carry these elements through the footlights. All these conditions have been faithfully observed, both in respect to the play and the people. Margaret Lawrence is a pleasing object in the dramatic landscape, and has that degree of enslaving witchery necessary to account for the constancy of Rosalie's ex-husband. To be sure Reggie, the ex-husband, gets tangled up in an engagement with another pretty and enslaving girl. But then Reggie was just following routine. It is written in the tenets of a fashionable divorce that a second fashionable marriage must soon follow, and poor, constant Reggie, aching for his Rosalie, salves, or tries to salve, over the wound with the honey distilled from the heguling lips of pretty Marcia.

The two women, Margaret Lawrence and Helen Spring, although neither of them are downright beauties, are smart, attractive, and New Yorkish. Margaret Lawrence is more subtle than the other girl. I rather imagine she could tackle a more serious rôle and do it full justice. Miss Lawrence makes of Rosalie a beguiling object for an enamored husband to renounce, suggesting deeps in that young woman's mental outfit that promises ample future entertainment for Reggie. There are very tones in Miss Lawrence's voice which are lost when she raises it; something for an actress otherwise so pleasing to remedy.

Helen Spring cultivates the baby voice, although her physiognomy scarcely accords. She plays a very good second, and we very much enjoy the tournure of these two New York players.

Wallace Eddinger, who captured us in "Boomerang," travels, perhaps, too much on his captivating personality. I can't quite make out whether a somewhat slovenly rapid utterance is assumed or otherwise. But strange to say it is part of this young man's indubitable attraction, as is also his ability to inform his utterances with a flavor of comedy that makes us smile irresistibly.

Clarke Silvernail is a clever young man, and did his half-fervid, half-suggestively comedy love-making very neatly. There is, perhaps, a little too much manner in his acting, but better too much than too little.

The balance in this particular was cleverly struck by Percy Ames, who, as Reggie's nonchalant friend, wore an air that was delightfully casual, whether he exchanged carefully restrained hadinage with a servant, amities with his friend, or flirtatious chaff with he-witching Rosalie.

Another good actor in the company is John Harwood, who, as Jackson, the English butler, conveyed precisely the right degree of deference, nicely blended with a discreet love for gentlemanly persiflage and a respectful good-fellowship toward the two men who tolerated Jackson's peccadilloes for the sake of his man's man perfection.

And there are still more in this well-balanced and carefully selected company. Maud Andrew as the ladies' maid expressed, in her demeanor with her equals, that working-girl ability to take care of herself mingled with an irresistible relish for what life, diverting life, offers that was very well conceived.

Mrs. Martin as the mother and Sakichi Iwamoto as the Japanese houseboy were both able to blend that suggestion of humor in their utterances that placed them in general accord with a play built—and successfully built—to put an audience into high good humor and to keep it laughing.

"THE CHOCOLATE SOLDIER."

This gay and genial opera, the story of which is founded upon that delightful comedy of G. B. Shaw's which, like many of this writer's works, has been misunderstood because Shaw is always stripping away illusions, is doubly dowered with surpassing talent. Oscar Straus was thoroughly in the vein when he composed the music, and the result is a work which has not become at all outdated.

"Arms and the Man" is a satire on the false idea of military valor and romantic ideals. Bumerli, it will be observed, pricks Nadine's romantic bubbles by carrying an unloaded pistol and a loaded pocket, chocolate being the charge. Nadine's sense of the heroic and the picturesque is outraged, and she calls him "the chocolate soldier," but, although she protests she hates him, she goes back on "her hero," to whom she is betrothed, and loves the common-sense man, who responds easily to her scornful question, "Are you afraid to die?" "All soldiers are, dear lady." In fact, the bubbles pricked by Shaw in "Arms and the Man" are shattered in more burlesque style in "The Chocolate Soldier" because the comedy lends itself so admirably to the heightened satire running into burlesque which is employed in the opera.

Shaw certainly scored in his comedy. We have learned, from the lessons taught by the world war, of the necessity of conserving soldiers' lives, of the folly of exposing them unnecessarily, of the prudence of keeping individual soldiers supplied with food, no matter how slightly, and of the value of chocolate as a light pocket ration. All these points have been developed since Shaw wrote the play, and, oddly enough, they fit admirably into the game of verbal give and take between Bumerli and Nadine when "the chocolate soldier," pursued by the enemy, invades Nadine's maiden tower and methodically eats his chocolate when more enticing provisions are denied him.

Exaggerated into burlesque though the original satire of the play is, yet the chullience of Shaw's temperament is there and the keenness of his wit. There is also quite a lot of atmosphere. Whether or not it is Bulgarian doesn't trouble our ignorance particularly, as long as they have the Bulgarian costumes, the Bulgarian embroidery, and a sort of Balkan suggestions to things. Wherein it lies I couldn't exactly say; perhaps in our willing imagination, but it is very much helped out by the colloquy between the Popoffs and Bumerli, in which Mama Popoff haughtily intimates to the suitor that their silver is all genuine and that they wash themselves almost every day.

A burlesque which has such stimulating material for a base can not but be irresistibly funny. There was a largely Eastern audience there the night I was present, and an Eastern audience is much less receptive and expansive than a Californian one. But the champagne bubble of wit, the genial flow of humor, and the irresistible surge of the burlesque was too much for the audience. The composure of the effete East was shattered. They began to laugh out loud in spite of themselves, and at the finale one heard voices all over the house joining spontaneously in that ever young and popular love song, which is the fine crest of all those joyous waves of Oscar Straus' music.

I call that a triumph for the company, for the opera has lived through such an era of popularity that to theatre habitués it had no novelty to offer. It is a very good company, and rejoices in the possession of a particularly attractive pair of leads. Ann Tasker was not there, but she has been playing, I believe, on alternate nights. Eva Olivetti, her alternate, is more the dependable than the alluring type, but she is an intelligent actress and a fair singer. Marie Horgan as the mother shows naturalness and humor and a solid contralto which tells in the choruses. Lavinia Winn as the heguling Mascha is pretty and sprightly, and the chorus presented an attractive ensemble of youth and good looks, and did up its musical contribution in good shape.

Jefferson De Angelis has no such fat rôle as that of Koko, but all his fine comedy as well as his hurlesque is charged with that perpetual chullience of humor which gives his work its unfailing popularity.

Two very handsome men in the company gladden feminine hearts by their youth, their good looks, and the grace with which they carry their handsome uniforms. J. Humbird Duffey as Bumerli is a heart smasher par excellence. This young man has dash, magnetism, grace, irresistible charm, a set of milk-white teeth which would inspire a dentist to write an ode, a smile which they fitly adorn, and a fine tenor voice, not to mention that he is an easy, graceful, assured actor either as sentimental or light comedian. Edward Quinn, whom we saw during the recent Gilbert and Sullivan season, is a fine athletic figure of a man and is also dowered with a fine assortment of masculine charms, including an excellent haritone, and furthermore acts extremely well. Both men make love so well as to please the romantic observers.

The music, of course, is too familiar to require a verdict. Thoroughly delightful all through, the company, with its engaging equipment of agreeable voices, does it full justice, and whether viewed as satire, hurlesque, or operatic entertainment, the performance was given with animation, spontaneity, and finish.

"RICHARD III."

The summer season and an unusually heavy exodus to the country did not prevent the Players Club from putting on "Richard III" with William S. Rainey in the title rôle. Mr. Rainey, it seems, studied the rôle while in the East, which happened at a time that gave him the opportunity to see John Barrymore in the part. The rôle of Richard is a very taxing one, requiring ample vocal volume and an ability on the player's part to show mockery mingled with the intensity of bitterness toward more fortunate humanity that is felt by the man of saturnine temperament whom destiny has made crippled and deformed.

And accompanying this central figure of evil, this conscienceless monster of iniquity, are the many victims whom Richard slew or had slain in order to accomplish his fell purpose. No prince must be let live who stood between him and the royal succession. It is no light task to portray a character so ruthless, so resolute in crime, so inaccessible to emotions of compunction and pity toward all of his kin.

Mr. Rainey is o'er young to do so, but he has the voice, the talent for tragic impersonation, and the personality that enables him to hold the attention in a central rôle. Also he well expresses the hard mockery with which Richard toyed with his victims.

As to the terror inspired by that sinister figure, well, it takes either a trained veteran or a genius to stir the imagination to such depths as that. The young player fixed a malignant sneer upon his lips, his hack was humped, and one leg dragged. But he was not quite sinister enough, sinister figure though he was. The ability to portray a conscienceless monster so as to inspire in the awed imagination a sense of terror must be a plant of slow growth. It is far easier for an actor to please by the romantic charm with which he invests a character. It is therefore greatly to the credit of the young player that he essayed so ambitious a rôle and that he succeeded in it, even though his success is limited to the proportion fixed by his youth and comparative inexperience.

"Richard III" is a play that draws very heavily upon the personnel of a company. Those royal personages must or should have the grand manner, something that has almost passed away from the stage since strictly modern drama has so displaced Shakespeare and the cape-and-sword plays.

In this respect the company, when one pauses to remember that they are only semi-professional, and some of them hemi-demi-semi, deserves a good mark, and when they give the play at the Greek Theatre during the summer session season at the university they will gain greatly by their increased distance from the audience. The entire performance, indeed, will be quite impressive, for all the rôles have been so carefully trained, and the players have entered into the atmosphere of historical tragedy with such sympathy, and, no doubt, with inward delight, that no jarring note is struck by a single player. The principal fault is the inevitable one with players whose lives are not strictly dedicated to the profession, and that is the inability to so submerge their identity into a character as to completely capture the imagination. It is, indeed, the great difficulty with all players; a difficulty to meet which requires not only a complaisant imagination, but a pretty complete equipment of the actor's technic; the which can only be acquired by constant experience before the public.

Mrs. A. W. Scott, for instance, a lady who, as Queen Elizabeth, displayed beauty, a queenly port, and a fine stage presence, did not, when the queen descended from the throne she graced so well, move across the stage with the majesty of a sovereign. Her gait was too short-stepped and modern. It was the walk of a fashionable, high-heeled woman. Her emotion, too, was too much on the surface; a thing of outcries and gestures. Nevertheless, except for a tendency to express a climax of feeling by remaining open-mouthed for a moment or so, those external manifestations of queenly revolt against humiliation and anguish were well conceived.

Marie Louise Myers invested with the graces of her youth and beauty the character of Lady Anne, seeming, perhaps, a thought too tenderly young for the royal widow. The young actress read her lines very intelligently, and in the rapid-fire wooing scene expressed the gradations of Lady Anne's gradual surrender with an admirable sense of proportion, considering that this is one of the scenes in which Shakespeare calmly eschewed proportion and probability.

Mr. Purrington's stage accent has improved, although his voice needs some exercises in vocal relaxation to free it from that effect of chronic throat contraction. Mr. Purrington gave the Duke of Clarence's long monologue very creditably, for he made us enjoy the Shakespearean roll of the blank verse. In the famous sword-play scene with Richard—for he doubled the rôle and became Richmond—the two players bore themselves with an effect of physical ardor for the fray, but the conflict was prudently shortened, modern actors even of the regular stage not being up to supplying the thrills in this scene furnished by those former giants of the stage who used to work themselves up in advance for the great fight. Was it not Macready who, seizing an unfortunate chair with which to slay an imaginary enemy, used, just preceding this scene, to pace up and down the stage, gnashing his teeth and uttering furious curses?

Louis Steiger's depiction of Edward IV had good points. Morris Ankrum's Buckingham well expressed the furtive craft of an accomplice of Richard's not quite evil enough to keep abreast with the deeds of the royal murderer. Like Mrs. Scott, Jane Parent was better in externals than in imaginative suggestion. Her reading, also, lacked complete carrying quality.

The general cast did highly creditable work, even down to the children, who had been trained too carefully to strike jarring notes. There are a lot of young men in the cast, too numerous to specify, who contributed youthful enthusiasm, athletic contours agreeably in evidence in the costumes of the time, and fine, resounding voices. They will be very important elements in what many witnesses of the performance feel confident will be a Greek Theatre success. Several times in the small Players Club Theatre the emotions of excitement, revolt, and horror seemed too noisily expressed, but on the majestic proportions of the stage of the Greek Theatre all that vocal volume will tell.

Mrs. Scott's ample voice and perhaps that of Mrs. Parent will give those ladies the confidence that comes from a sure prop. Miss Myers' voice has a reliable carrying quality, all the men are vocally dependable, and the throne-room scenes and the well-trained slow and stately entrances and withdrawals to and from the presence of the two kings who hold court will gain greatly in impressiveness.

JOSEPHINE HART PHELPS.

No. 54 Hunter Street, Brunswick Square, London, the birthplace of John Ruskin, is for sale by private treaty. In the early days of the nineteenth century John James Ruskin came to London from Edinburgh to enter the wine trade. In 1818 he married his cousin, Margaret Cox, and February 8, 1819, the author of "Sesame and Lilies" was born. The house in Hunter Street, which is now distinguished by a commemorative tablet, is of the substantial Georgian type so well known in Bloomsbury, and was erected at a time when that district was particularly in favor among city merchants. The accommodation is ample, and all modern conveniences have been installed.

FOYER AND BOX-OFFICE.

The Columbia Theatre.

Sunday, July 4th. will mark the production at the Columbia Theatre by the New Bostonians of "The Prince of Pilsen," with Jefferson De Angelis in the title-role of Hans Wagner.

Those acquainted with the facts in the case look for a splendid presentation of this delightful piece, for Frank Pixley, who wrote "The Prince of Pilsen," had De Angelis in mind when he created the part of Wagner and San Francisco has never seen De Angelis in the part. The glorious tenor of J. Humbird Duffey will win new laurels for that capable artist as Lieutenant Wagner, Detmar Poppin should prove a delight as Francois, Edward Quinn will be an excellent Prince, and Lavinia Winn should be charming as Nellie.

Leslie Leigh, a prima donna new to these parts, will sing, and others in the cast will be Dorothy Elton, Sam Burton (specially engaged for Artie), Eva De Verna, Billie Newell, and Frank Risdale. The big chorus of the New Bostonians, under the direction of Paul Steindorff, will prove still another magnet. "The Prince of Pilsen" will remain at the Columbia for the rest of the week, with matinees on Wednesday and Saturday.

The Curran Theatre.

Preceded by the most enthusiastic accounts, Charlotte Greenwood, the famous comedienne in Oliver Morosco's latest musical comedy, "Linger Longer Letty," will come to the Curran Theatre on Sunday evening, July 4th, for a limited engagement. The visits here of Miss Greenwood are always eagerly awaited, and it is stated that in "Linger Longer Letty" she is funnier than ever. "Linger Longer Letty" is a sequel to the comedienne's famous comedy, "So Long Letty," in which she was last seen here.

The book is by Anna Nichols, who is responsible for numerous successful comedies, lyrics by Bernard Grossman, and music by Alfred Goodman.

The story has to do with the trials and tribulations of Letty, who is one of a large family, and is made the drudge of the family by her pleasure-loving sisters; because she is the only one of the family that can cook and sew she is tucked away in the kitchen until she finally rebels, goes on a strike, and starts on a social career of her own that leads into the funniest of complications and results.

In the cast surrounding Miss Greenwood there appear such well-known musical-comedy favorites as Charles P. Morrison, Olga Roller, Robert Higgins, Valerie True, George Sweet, Frances Bendsten, and a large chorus of Broadway beauties.

The Alcazar Theatre.

There will be another infusion of new blood in the Alcazar company next Sunday, July 4th. Inez Ragan, a young Eastern leading woman of charm and magnetism, will make her first San Francisco appearance as the heart-hungry little heiress in Edward Childs Carpenter's ideal comedy of youth, love, and laughter, "The Cinderella Man." She should prove a delightful foil to tall, dark Dudley Ayres as the poor but optimistic poet. "The Cinderella Man" is the humorous and pathetic story of a poor little rich girl, fresh from a convent, lonely in a mansion, who plays Santa Claus to the struggling poet, starving in his garret, whose verses have captured her romantic fancy, and who is mistaken by him for her own maid. The cast includes Miss Ragan as Marjorie Caner, Mr. Ayres as Anthony Quintard, Brady Kline as the lawyer, Henry Shumer as the doctor, Rafael Brunetto as the millionaire, Ben Erway as the society dawdler, Fred Green as the composer, Al Cunningham as the gentle old valet, Walter Belasco as the butler, Jean Oliver as the French maid, and Anna MacNaughton as the Great She-Bear.

"On the Hiring Line," to have first Pacific Coast production Sunday, July 11th, is George C. Tyler's recent New York laughing success by Harvey O'Higgins and Harriet Ford, based upon the all-absorbing servant problem, with three love stories and a very funny undercurrent of detective mystery.

The Orpheum.

"Kiss Me" is the somewhat startling title of a new musical extravaganza which will be presented at the Orpheum next week. Musical pieces are mostly composed of girls, and "Kiss Me" is no exception. The girls have been so carefully picked and are so attractive and so handsomely gowned that again the title "Kiss Me" seems appropriate. The music and lyrics are by William B. Friedlander. As is his custom, he has made them a part of the story, so that the plot, for what there is of it is told in both dialogue and song. This concerns a young man who must have a family in order to increase the allowance awarded him by an aunt. There are five principals, with Dorothea Sadlier, Isabelle Winlock, and Harry Meyer enjoying featured distinction.

If one of the characteristics of midnight sons is breaking into song, Eddie Kane and Jay Herman are undoubtedly "midnight sons." They are not serenaders, but are uncommonly good comedy song singers.

Pretty, dainty little "Resista," weighing only ninety-eight pounds, has proved the superiority of mind over matter. If she so desires any one with sufficient strength to lift her can do so, but if she wills otherwise no power in a human frame can lift her tiny toes from off the floor.

John Gardner and Marie Hartman have done their bits in musical comedy these many seasons. They term their efforts "Vaudeville Vagaries." They include a skit called "Before and After Marriage" and a fine assortment of songs and dances.

Eary and Eary present a whirlwind novelty, using Egyptian rings. They are the originators of this kind of act and the only ones performing it.

Buch is the surname of two brothers who offer an amusing athletic sketch called "Spilling the Beans."

M. and Mme. Bartholdi have a novel act in which fifty tropical birds do most diverting feats. Probably the most remarkable is that of riding a bicycle.

The only holdover in this remarkable bill will be Joseph E. Howard and his company in his musical romance, "Chin Toy," which has scored a tremendous hit.

Antonio Scotti.

It has long been acknowledged that Antonio Scotti, the famous baritone of the Metropolitan Opera House, who brings 150 people from the Metropolitan to San Francisco in October for a week of grand opera under the local direction of Frank W. Healy, has been the most powerful art influence that this country has ever known. For years an idol on the Metropolitan stage, he has set a standard almost impossible to equal, and he has been the inspiration of all his colleagues, foreign and American, to give an acceptable performance on the same stage that held him. The secret of the almost instantaneous success with which Mr. Scotti's grand opera company met from the very start lies in the master hand which directs every performance.

"One of the reasons why so many Americans think they do not like grand opera," Scotti says, "is because they have never heard grand opera. They have heard some indifferent performances given in a slipshod manner with perhaps a few good singers, a lot of shabby costumes and scenery, with chorus people who stand around in idle groups walking on and off the stage, sometimes in the right place but more often in the wrong, the whole a potpourri of meaningless jumble without any stage direction, and they go home and say, No more grand opera for me. The finest singers in the world can not save a performance from being dull unless they have the support which comes from faithful attention to every detail of stage direction, scenery, and costuming. It is not so much the size of the company as it is these things which go to make up artistic performances, and when given artistically grand opera can not fail to make its appeal to the most humble music lover, even though he may have never witnessed a performance."

Theda Bara has written a play. It is to be produced by A. H. Woods. Other than that she has written it and Woods will produce it, nothing can be learned as to its nature, its length, or whether the eminent "vamp" will star in it. The parties concerned are silent on these points.

Magnets Serve World in Many Ways.

A highly important use of a magnet is that in which it is sometimes employed to withdraw small pieces of iron from such out-of-the-way places as the human eye. Another use of the tractive force of magnetism on a much larger scale was that to which it was put by Edison in his magnetic ore separator, in which the ore, previously crushed to a fine powder, is dropped down a chute past the poles of powerful electro-magnets, in passing which the iron particles of the ore are deflected to one side, while the non-magnetic stone dust continues undeflected down the chute. Still another instance of the employment of magnetism in a small way is that in which a magnetized tack hammer is used in the manufacture of strawberry baskets on a large scale in conjunction with a mechanical device which presents the tacks, one at a time and head up, to the operative, thereby greatly facilitating his work.

It is a far cry from lifting a tack by means of magnetism to the lifting of massive iron and steel plates weighing four, six, and twelve tons by this same force, which is now done every work day in a number of large steel works. Electro-magnetism, of course, is utilized, the form of the magnet being usually rectangular for this work and presenting a flat surface to the plates lifted. The magnets are suspended by chains from cranes, and pick up the plates by simple contact. The metal plates can be lifted by the magnet while still so hot that it would be impossible for men to handle them. The ratio of weight lifted varies with the machine; in some cases this ratio is thirty. Thus, a magnet is operated by current from a dynamo, controlled by switches and rheostats.

George F. Burba, an Ohio newspaper editor, spent a few days in New York, and while there somebody asked him how he liked the big town. "I care for it very little," replied Burba. "Did you ever think of this: Supposing you lived in New York and wanted to go fishing. Where would you go to dig a can of worms?"

VANITY FAIR.

The casual observer from foreign parts, Mr. Ibañez for example, may well be puzzled as he tries to identify the standard of feminine popularity in America. Presumably he has been reading our newspapers, looking at our movies, listening to our plays, doing all the things that one does in the effort to gauge the mind and manners of a nation. He has seen the exaltation of the feminine eccentric, and he has heard the plaudits with which her escapades have been rewarded. He has watched the new woman pursuing her soul—usually without success—"blush her own life," whatever that may mean, and passionately demanding a number of things that are specified only in the vaguest terms, but that are generically included in the word freedom. He has heard her vociferously refusing to have babies, or to put on clothes, or to remain unaware of the naughtiest things. And we have put her on the front page of our newspapers, chronicled her doings, passed laws at her bidding, and tried not to blush while she was explaining things to us. Naturally the afore-said intelligent foreigner, Mr. Ibañez again, believes that he has discovered the American ideal of womanhood. He will give it a chapter in the book of "American Impressions" that he intends to write for the edification of his countrymen. Of course he will have to be a little careful. He will dilute his colors and soften his high lights. He must not strain the credulity of his compatriots nor shock the susceptibilities of his own effete civilization. When Du Chaillu, the explorer, first described the gorilla he was denounced as a nature faker. He was told that "there aint no such a animle," as the countryman said when he first saw the rhinoceros at the zoo. If the popular American woman as caricatured in our Sunday supplements or in the great American drama were presented without precautionary modifications and dilutions to a South European audience she would be rejected as a nature fake.

But let us suppose that the intelligent foreigner—be exists, Senator Borah to the contrary—were here during a presidential election and at a time when the claims of the various candidates were receiving a public attention that is usually quite incommensurate with their merits. What a change then would come over the spirit of his dream. For he would read not only of the celestial virtues of the husbands, but of the domestic virtues of the wives. No character sketch of a presidential aspirant is complete, be it observed, without an adulatory concluding note about the lady who shares his home and inspires his ambitions. And what a model of the proprieties she invariably is. Of course she takes no interest in politics except to hope that the laudable ambitions of her excellent husband, whatever they may be, will be sustained. She is far too busy with church, nursery, and kitchen to engage in the great movements of the day. She belongs to no women's clubs. The home, she says, is the real women's club and it is enough for her. No, she has no views on the suffrage other than those that have been, or may be, expressed by her lord, and such matters as birth control and sex hygiene seem to her hut as echoes from a far-off world from which she is willingly excluded by the tender privacies of home life. And of course she has children, almost invariably. Three is about the correct number, although it is naturally difficult to foresee the exigencies of political life. A family group photograph is always a strong card. It should be taken preferably on the piazza, as a lawn may look a little pretentious. Two girls and a sturdy little boy grasping his mother's skirts are very effective, and if the pet names of the children can be included in the caption, so much the better. The lady should be attired neatly but not gaudily. She should give the impression of having just "tidied up" after a day of domestic toil, and she may appropriately say a few cautious words—but they must be very cautious—about the high cost of living and the consequent strain upon a slender income. But let her not deviate into any other manifestation of intelligence. She must not wander across the line of domesticity. She must not have any opinions on anything under the sun outside the home. Her general deportment should be that of maternal and uxorial idiocy.

No one can imagine anything else. The ideal woman of the newspapers goes by the board in a moment and we go back to the primitive. Imagine, if you can, a presidential biographical or character sketch which announced that the wife of the candidate was a well-known suffragist, that she was one of the ladies who had helped to picket the White House under the previous administration, or that she would be remembered as having aided in burning in effigy the British ambassador. Imagine an announcement that she had participated in a hunger strike, or a "hike," that she had distributed pamphlets on birth control or that she was well known for her advanced opinions on the single standard. Imagine it being known that she had done any one of the things to which we give our cackling applause when they are done by other women. Why she is not allowed even the innocent diversion of a single divorce. Her highest merit is, not that she has been much in the public eye, but that no one ever heard of her before; not that she has advanced opinions, but that she has no opinions at all; not that she is the leader of movements, but that she was never known to move in the least; not that she belongs to the new era, but that she is prehistoric.

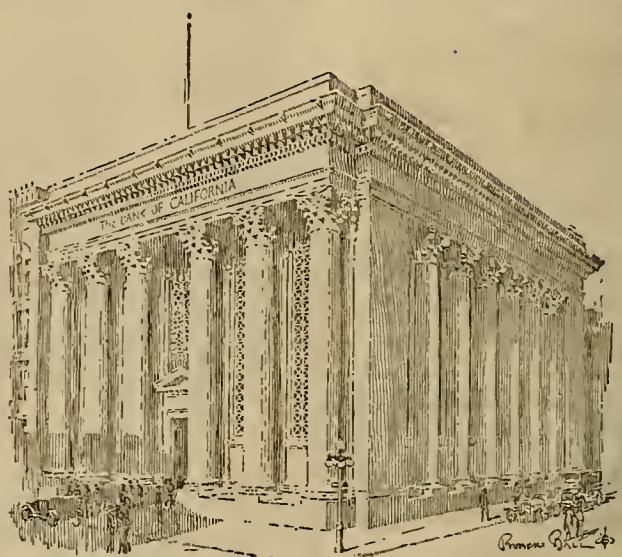

Now either we have two feminine ideals or one of them is a false one. No would-be President would dare to own a wife who had any one of the characteristics that we seem almost to deify in our ordinary everyday life. He would never come within sight of the nomination. He would not even be a "dark horse," or any sort of a horse. He would not be able even to divorce her without irreparable damage to his hopes. Truly, we are a very extraordinary people.

One of the largest projectiles has just been made in England despite the fact that the war is over. On his recent visit to Sheffield, England, Mr. Lloyd George was shown a full-sized model of a projectile nearly eight feet long and weighing nearly two and one-half tons. The Hadfield works are prepared to undertake the production of this great shell and to guarantee that at point-blank range it will perforate a thickness of four feet of bard-faced armor and at its full range, say twenty-five miles, it would have sufficient energy to perforate an armor plate about sixteen inches thick. The muzzle energy of the gun to fire such a projectile would be about 250,000 foot-tons. Such a gun, however, remains to be made, and furthermore it would require a good-sized war to justify its production, so Sir Robert Hadfield's new toy is likely to remain in the model stage for a time.

Massachusetts makes a pair of shoes for everybody in the United States every year. Spins a million bales of cotton every year. Grinds out cloth—all wool and a yard wide—enough to wind around the equator six times and some over.

Modern Services For Old Friends and New

THIS institution for many years has served to the best of its ability not only the people and concerns of San Francisco, but also of the back country and the entire Pacific Coast. We attach great value to the friendship of our old customers, for it is through them that the aims, ideals and actual accomplishments of the bank become known to the younger generation.

Old as we are in point of time, we are modern in point of service. That is, there is no function of present day banking and trust service which we cannot render with the intelligence and dispatch of a well established, thoroughly experienced and smoothly operating organization.

We invite you to call and discuss any banking or trust matters with our officers.

STORYETTES.

Grave and Gay, Epigrammatic and Otherwise.

Bishop Flipper said in an Atlanta sermon: "Much homely wisdom is to be gathered from our aged brethren. There is old Brother Wash White, for example. Wash said to me yesterday, in condonation of a politician's errors: 'De man wot haint nevah made a mistake, bishop, haint no saint—he's jest a liar.'"

A wag arriving at a railway station one evening found all seats in the train occupied. Opening one of the doors, he exclaimed, "Why, this train isn't going!" A general stampede ensued, and the wag took a comfortable seat. In the midst of the general indignation he was asked, "Why did you say the train wasn't going?" "Well, it wasn't then," replied the wag, "but it is now."

S. S. McClure said in the smoking-room of the Mauretania: "Anybody who thinks that man rules the roost need only consider the bareback gowns. What man wants his wife to go out in a bareback gown for other men to gawk at? And yet, 'I see your wife is sporting in a bareback gown of the most—er—ultra type,' a broker said to a hanker. The banker nodded. 'But you told me you'd never let her wear a bareback gown!' The hanker nodded again. 'She overheard me telling you,' he said."

A student had a barrel of ale deposited in his room, contrary, of course, to rule and usage. He received a summons to appear before the president. "Sir, I am informed that you have a barrel of ale in your room," said the latter. "Yes, sir." "Well, what explanation can you make?" "Why, the fact is, sir, my physician advised me to try a little each day as a tonic, and not wishing to go to the various places where the leverage is retailed, I arranged to have a barrel taken to my room." "Indeed, and have you derived any benefit from the use of it?" "Oh, yes, sir. When the barrel was first taken to my room I could scarcely lift it. Now I can carry it easily."

A critic said at the Players' Club: "All our popular authors managed to get to France on one excuse or another during the war and now they all interlard their stories with French phrases. Those French phrases! How awful they are! How they make you laugh if you know French at all! A woman magazine writer, who gets $300 apiece for her short stories, came into a restaurant the other day and sat down near me. She wore a 'Y' uniform. I knew she'd had a week or two abroad. 'Got any bon vivant?' she said to the waiter. 'But, madame, I don't understand,' the waiter, a Parisian, stammered. 'Go on! I thought you were French!' said the woman magazine writer. 'Bon vivant means good liver. Bring me some with hacon.'"

A witness before the Senate Committee on Finance, which handles tariff and other revenue bills, was testifying at a hearing regarding dyestuffs, in which industry much alcohol is used. With all the restrictions surrounding the alcohol industry at this time a member of the committee, who was somewhat at a loss to know how the manufacturer obtained alcohol, said: "I suppose you have a great deal of difficulty in obtaining alcohol now?" "Oh, no," said the witness, "none at all. You see, we have a great deal stored and have an almost unlimited supply on hand." "I'll see you later," said the senator with a laugh. Which indicates that the shortage of liquid refreshments among the members of the staid old Senate is beginning to be felt.

Mark Thisthethwaite, secretary to Vice-President Marshall, invented a neat little scheme a while ago for getting rid of the visitor who tarries too long after he has ceased to have anything of real consequence to say. Such a visitor was closeted with the Vice-President and several other callers were waiting outside. Now, Thisthethwaite is an exceptionally courteous young person and would not injure the feelings of even the humblest citizen. Yet he wished that the man with Mr. Marshall would be on his way. Suddenly he had an inspiration. He seized a telegraph blank and wrote on it: "Don't let this man stay all day. There are others waiting to see you." This he took in and gravely placed before the Vice-President, who scrutinized it thoughtfully, as if it had to do with empire building. "Ah, yes," said Marshall, "I'll dictate a reply to that in just a moment." The visitor took the hint and proceeded on his way.

"I don't know what the young men of today are coming to," said Mr. Smith. "In my young days there wasn't any need for all this courting. The girls then—" But he was cut short by the coal scuttle which Mrs. Smith accidentally dropped on his toes. "I was only going to say, my dear," he remarked, when he had recovered his composure, "that I wish the young fellow who is calling on Christabel would go away and let us get the house shut up. It's past midnight." At that moment there entered the small boy of the household. He had been, for the last hour or so, behind the draught screen in the drawing-room and vowed that he had enjoyed himself better than if he had been at a Punch and Judy show. "It isn't his fault, pa," said the heir of the Smiths. "He can't go; Christabel's sitting on him!"

Two young women entered a car and found only standing room. One of them whispered to her companion: "I'm going to get a seat from one of these men." She looked down the row of passengers and selected a very sedate man, who bore the general settled appearance of a married man. She sailed up to him and boldly opened fire: "My dear Mr. Green, how delighted I am to meet you! You are almost a stranger. Will I accept your seat? Well, I do feel tired, I heartily admit. Thank you so much." The sedate gentleman, a total stranger, of course, looked, listened, then quietly arose and gave her his seat, saying: "Sit down, Jane, my girl. Don't often see you out on a washing day. You must feel tired, I am sure. How's your mistress?" The young woman got her seat, but lost her vivacity.

THE MERRY MUSE.

The Rich Man.
The rich man has his motor-car,
His country and his town estate.
He smokes a fifty-cent cigar
And jeers at Fate.

He frivols through the livelong day,
He knows not Poverty, her pinch.
His lot seems light, his heart seems gay;
He has a cinch.

Yet though my lamp burns low and dim,
Though I must slave for livelihood—
Think you that I would change with him?
You bet I would!
—Franklin P. Adams.

Old Clo'es Man.
The old-fashioned pants with the springs at the bottom,
With welts at the seams and with stripes an inch wide,
Still hang in the attic, I'm glad I have got 'em—
Those duck-footed pants of my passionate pride.
Ah, well I remember how haughty and airy
I strode down the avenue, thrilled to the heart,
With Mazie beside me as blithe as a fairy—
A fashion-plate couple so trim and so tart.

The coat, a Prince Albert of tail-lengthened splendor,
As tight as the skin of an eel, bless my eyes!
Plum-hued, double-breasted—my heart is still tender
For that senatorial garment, a prize!
It went like the flowers of springtime when fashion
Decreed that its usefulness was then out of date?
Quite wrong—in the attic! You can now het your cash on
The fact Uncle dons it again, and with state.

The garments once scorned on the line take an airing
To rid them of scent of moth balls, I should smile!
Your Uncle is wise, and no more he's despairing—
For profiteer sharks are no longer in style.
So, fashion go hang! I am satisfied, truly,
With what I've dug up—for next Sunday arrayed
In attic adornments you het I'll be duly Observed of observers when out on parade.
—Horace Seymour Keller in New York Sun.

Offer $500 Prize for Poetic Play.

The Poetry Society of America offers the William Lindsey prize of $500 for the best unproduced and unpublished full-length poetic play that will occupy an evening, written by an American citizen. No restrictions are placed upon the number of acts or scenes, or on the nature of the subject matter. The judges will be George Arliss, Professor George Pierce Baker of Harvard, Clayton Hamilton, Jessie B. Rittenhouse, and Stuart Walker.

Manuscripts should be sent by registered mail, the author's registry receipt to be considered sufficient acknowledgment. They must be submitted in typewritten form, fastened along the left edge of the page in one volume and signed with a pen name. An enclosed sealed envelope should be inscribed with the title of the play and the pen name, and contain a card with the correct name and address of the author, as well as the title of the play. This sealed envelope should also contain one self-addressed bearing the full amount of return postage, including registry.

The contest will close on July 1, 1921, and the successful play will be announced at the October meeting of the Poetry Society. Manuscripts should be addressed to the Drama Committee of the Poetry Society of America, care of Stuart Walker, chairman, Carnegie Hall, New York City.

THE MASTER SPIRIT

"All works of taste must bear a price in proportion to the skill, time, expense, and risk attending their manufacture. Those things called dear are, when justly estimated, the cheapest; they are attended with much less profit to the artist than those which everybody calls cheap."

Cushing, Mr. and Mrs. Charles Fay, Mrs. Gertrude Atherton, and Mrs. Truxtun Beale.

Mr. Wadsworth Harris.

Mr. Wadsworth Harris, whose residence in San Francisco some time back is not forgotten, has recently been giving a series of dramatic readings at Los Angeles. In the Examiner of that city we find a report of his appearance as guest of honor at a recital and musicale given by Dr. and Mrs. Alfred Guido Castles on Tuesday evening of this present week. Mr. Harris, who is a cousin of the poet Longfellow, has for many years past held high character as a professional interpreter of the finer things in poetic and dramatic literature. It is expected that he will soon visit San Francisco.

The Tiffen Room.

Artists, writers, and theatrical folk, as well as many who are not of the profession, are finding a congenial meeting-place every noon in the Aladdin Studio Tiffen Room at 220 Post Street. This delightful place is decorated in true Chinese art, and the entire atmosphere is Oriental, including the service by attractive little Chinese girls. Miss Hattie Mooser, who organized the Aladdin Children's Theatre, still retains in her studio the theatrical charm, having the walls lined with a most interesting collection of photographs of stars of the stage.

Dr. A. A. Brill, a member of the faculty of New York University, translator of the works of Freud and a leading American psychiatrist, makes a noteworthy contribution to current efforts to diagnose the ouija board craze in a statement in which he says that "the ouija board is used by people who want to get something for nothing." They are apt to be the same people who would go to a fortune-teller or a medium, though not all of them have done so. But the seeming marvels accomplished by the hewitched of furniture are, he says, due to the circumstance that "the ouija board is not guided by ghosts, but by the unconscious impulses of the persons who operate it."

Women mountain-climbers in Switzerland, if they are Americans, French, or English, and value their complexions, smear their faces with soot to protect them from the rays of the sun.

In the earliest colonial days in America musket balls passed for change, and were legal tender for sums under a shilling.

Do Moths Use Wireless?

Do moths use wireless telegraphy? This theory is not nearly so grotesque as it may appear (says Hubert Stringer in the London Daily Mail). During the pairing season in the month of June moths of certain species are observed to communicate with each other over distances as great as one or two miles by some means unknown. A female Vaporer moth, for instance, inclosed in a wooden pill-box, will attract males of its species from all directions.

Now, it is not by scent that the position of the female moth is discovered, since the males will approach down wind; neither can it be by a sound of some frequency inaudible to human ears, for a female may be inclosed in a sound-proof box and the males will still unerringly find her. Entomologists so far have shelved this mystery under the head of communication by some means unknown, and there in the textbooks the matter rests.

It is now high time that experiments were made upon the supposition that wireless telegraphy may afford a solution. If this should prove to be the fact it will undoubtedly be found that electro-magnetic waves of exceedingly short wave length are employed. Now, light is an electro-magnetic wave of very short wave length; both glow worms and fire-flies emit light under similar conditions, so there is nothing so very improbable in the emission of slightly longer, and hence invisible, waves by other insects.

Observed facts seem to lend color to the idea.

Moths have antennae. These, besides acting as feelers, may serve another use—that of transmitting and receiving aërials. The antennae of the female, who is the transmitter, differ in design from those of the male, who receives; that also agrees with wireless practice. Moreover, the male moth when approaching the female, is seen to alight often in an uncertain manner swinging his antennae, much as an operator swings a wireless direction frame to discover from what direction signals emanate.

Most of us have wondered at the curious "singiug" of the telegraph and telephone wires often heard along quiet country roads. It is suggested by one authority that the noises are due to vibrations transmitted to the wires by the posts, which receive them from the earth, and that they are the result of earth vibrations identical with those that the seismograph, or earthquake detector, records. The song of the wires, it is said, is the song of the barometer; if it is low a change in the weather may come in two days; if sharp, it may be immediate.

The Democratic Convention

To a fair understanding of what was done and why it was done by the Democratic National Convention it will be helpful to glance briefly at the conditions and circumstances of its inspiration—at its background, so to speak. First the President: Mr. Wilson, although a very sick man, clearly does not appreciate the measure of his own incapacity. Assured day by day by a fond wife and an obsequious entourage of physicians and secretaries that he is on the road to renewed health, he no doubt believes it to be true. Furthermore (the editor of the Argonaut was told this seriously by a personal friend) he believes himself divinely ordained as the guide and prophet of the American people. No man involuntarily has ever left the presidential office without feeling that the country was destined to suffer grievously through loss of his directing hand. It may easily be conceived that Mr. Wilson, thus stimulated in ambitions always inordinate, wished the nomination for himself. He would like to have had it if for no other reason than as a tribute to his vanities; possibly with a view to putting aside the crown some time during the campaign and himself naming the man to take his place on the ticket. All this, we believe, was in the back, if not at the front, of Mr. Wilson's amazingly self-centered mind. It accords consistently with the diplomacies by which he practically directed the course of the convention up to the hour it cut loose from leading-strings and ran its own course.

As everybody knows there have these many months been elements in the President's party critical of his administrative courses, profoundly resentful of his autocratic control of the party machinery. Active among these elements have been the Tammany Society of New York, the combination of Western political forces of which Tom Taggart of Indiana is the foremost figure, and the Thompson-Brennan outfit of Chicago, whose coöperative practice is active in both parties. Some two weeks or more before the meeting at San Francisco representatives of these anti-Wilson elements came together at Taggart's famous resort at French Lick for conference and organization. Men of political shrewdness as they are, they discovered that while they could not control the convention they might serve as a brake upon presidential dictation and ultimately—in the finals—possibly name the candidates. That there was both cunning and force in these calculations is very definitely illustrated in the outcome. Cox and Roosevelt represent, not the choice of the President, but that of the Brennan-Murphy-Taggart combination, which stands opposed to the President and all his works, not with respect to matters of principle, but of authority within the party. By its final action the convention practically abandoned the President and surrendered itself to the guidance of opposing elements.

From the hour of its opening up to within an hour of the nomination of Mr. Cox on the seventh day the presidential authority was absolute. In all ways it appeared to be a Wilson convention, and in truth Mr. Wilson would have been able at any time up to Monday to have named any other candidate than himself. He might even have named himself if he had had the temerity to go at the business boldly. But fear of rebuff made him timid, and although he had the ball fairly in hand, he was so fearful of a failure that he dared not throw it. But in all matters save that of his personal ambition he had his way. He was represented in or near the convention directly by five members of his cabinet, by a "brigade" made up of high officials, and on the floor itself by some hundreds of subservient delegates, holders of office or otherwise directly interested in the Administration. His authority dominated the platform committee and dictated its work. Likewise it threw out by arbitrary action a no less personage than Senator Reed of Missouri, who had given offense by opposing the President's project for the league of nations. It gave the cold shoulder to Mr. Bryan and by artful management succeeded for the first convention in twenty-five years in measurably shutting off his wind. Of the President's immediate group there were four open candidates for the presidential nomination—son-in-law and ex-Secretary of the Treasury McAdoo, Attorney-General Palmer, Secretary of State Colby, ex-Secretary of the Treasury Glass. All of these gentlemen were obviously subject to the President's will. He might do with the candidacy of any one of them as he wished. He might in the sixth and even early in the seventh day of the session have dictated the nomination of any one of them. That he did not do so may be taken as proof that his deep-down wish was for his own nomination. In his calculation, as we conceive it, he wished them to hold the boards until the convention in weariness should turn to him.

It was at this point that the Brennan-Murphy-Taggart combination found its opportunity. It had succeeded against tremendous odds in holding its forces practically intact, and in the final moment, when the necessity for nominating somebody became paramount, it succeeded in putting over Governor Cox of Ohio. This could not have been done if the President earlier in the game had been willing to put aside his own candidacy and to have placed the whole of his influence behind any one of the several "friends of the Administration" who had carried themselves thus far well up in the balloting. Unquestionably he could have named Attorney-General Palmer, and the fact that he did not do it is probably the reason why that gentleman, spurred to resentment, contributed to the nomination of Cox by withdrawal at the very moment the presidential coup was at the convention door.

There comes a time, if he lives long enough, in the career of every great champion of any cause when his powers relax or he is overmatched. Thus Cæsar came to his end. Thus Napoleon came to his Waterloo. Thus—coming down several pegs—John L. Sullivan got his knock-out. So with William J. Bryan. The prestige of his success in former conventions, the acclaim of his convention projects, were not sustained last week. He was, it will be remembered, going to "rip up" the league of nations. Also he was going to put a bone-dry plank in the platform. With respect to these matters there was to be no compromise. Mr. Bryan was to "nail them to the cross" if there should be failure, especially in the matter of the dry plank, to submit to his wishes. As it happened, Mr. Bryan did none of the things he was expected to do. He did not attempt outside of the committee room, where he was roundly snubbed by ex-Secretary Glass, to define the party attitude on the league of nations, and when it came to his "dry" proposal he merely raved about for a brief while, only to surrender in the end to what he saw to be inevitable. The incident marks the definite fall of Mr. Bryan, not indeed from his earlier high estate, for that had long been lost, but from pretensions which have so long persisted in the face of exposure of his essential shallowness and practical incapability.

Mr. Cox is an Ohio man, a three-time governor of that state, an ex-congressman, and publisher of two newspapers at Dayton. He is a man of popular manners and of vote-getting qualities. In his gubernatorial campaigns he has had the support of the "wet" element, and while in his first expression following his nomination he sought to minimize his representative character as a wet champion, he has not succeeded in doing it completely and he will hardly be able to do it later on. A man about whose name there lingers a wet atmosphere, a man nominated through the machinations of Tom Taggart of Indiana (of the famous French Lick resort), of the Thompson-Brennan outfit of Chicago, and of the Tammany Society of New York will find the sledding hard in his efforts to present himself as free from the taint attaching to affiliation with the liquor interest. And the "liquor interest," in this instance, does not mean a conservative attitude antagonistic to hard liquor and not unfriendly to light wines and beers, but the liquor interest as interpreted by the distillers of the great corn belt and of the dealers throughout the country who have recently been put out of a profitable though disreputable business. On the personal side, Governor Cox is a respectable man, though relatively of light intellectual weight. He is a typical politician in a state where politics has long been a recognized vocation. He began life as the secretary of a congressman, busy with the political end of his patron's general activities, and he has held steadily to that line up to now, and always successfully. It is conceivable that in a campaign limited to Ohio and based on state issues Governor Cox might beat Senator Harding. How it may be with the issues broadened to include national affairs and international relations only time may tell. One thing is certain, the campaign in Ohio between now and November will be a continuous and a hot performance.

Mr. Franklin Roosevelt was nominated for the vice-presidency by the Brennan-Murphy-Taggart combine under various motives. First of all, his name was counted upon as a winning card. As a member of the Federal brigade—he is Assistant Secretary of the Navy and closely in touch with the Administration—his nomination is a sop to Mr. Wilson. He is representative in a sense—he hails from Poughkeepsie—of up-state New York and at the same time is known and acceptable to Tammany. Personally, Mr. Roosevelt is a man of notable appearance and of great personal charm. He is a cousin—in fifth degree—of Theodore Roosevelt and his wife is the daughter of a brother of T. R.

Plainly the ticket was framed with the idea of connecting up the large electoral votes of Ohio and New York with the votes of the Solid South. In the nominations the demands of geography, of personal popularity, of the prestige of success, of the moist sentiment, and of political arithmetic are satisfactorily answered. Unquestionably we shall have a campaign of high emotions and of tremendous enthusiasms. Messrs. Harding and Coolidge have infinitely the more solid qualities. Messrs. Cox and Roosevelt are on the whole a showier team. Harding, it is understood, will remain quietly at home in Ohio during the summer months and receive whoever may care to call upon him "on the front porch." Mr. Cox will tour the country after the bad practice inaugurated some two or three campaigns back. Republicans and those with whom national and international issues, with immediate acquaintance with the working forces of the government, and with respect for substantial qualities are dominant will naturally support Harding and Coolidge. Democrats in general, with the organized groups controlled by Brennan in Illinois, Taggart in the Middle West, and Tammany Hall in New York, will support Cox and Roosevelt. Dry enthusiasts will probably attach themselves to the Harding cause. The liquor traffic in all its branches will assuredly be for Cox and Roosevelt.

The one striking act of personal rebellion against Mr. Wilson's domination of the convention was on the part of Attorney-General Palmer. He may not have conceived the programme—at least he did not take it. It was his withdrawal at a critical point that brought about the nomination of Cox. If he had "held the line" an hour longer the nomination might have gone to Mr. Wilson or to somebody of his choice. By Palmer's act this chance was lost; and with this loss fell Mr. Wilson's hold of the party sceptre. Aforetime we have seen the Wilsonian anger and resentment in action, notably and painfully in the case of Secretary Lansing. It is remorseless and conscienceless. Will Mr. Palmer be forgiven, will he remain in favor, or will he be made a new sacrifice to the wrath of a man profoundly wounded by disappointment and chagrin?

The League of Nations as a Campaign Issue.

The league of nations will be a leading if not the dominant issue of the forthcoming electoral campaign. The President so wills it. By his single decision the United States remains indefinitely in a state of war against Germany and Austria, while all the other great powers have been at peace for many months. The embassy and consular services remain in abeyance. Trade is paralyzed. The shadow of the sword, even though it be only a shadow, is still cast across the world. For the first time in American history the minds of the people will be directed rancorously toward Europe in all its divisions. The derelictions of the older nations, their past offenses, revenges, aggressions, and feuds will become part of American politics to the disturbance of the national unity and to the revival of forgotten and renounced patriotisms. All this is ordained by that spirit of Caesarism against which our armies fought in the field and which has crept behind their ranks and into their homes. Dr. David Jayne Hill says in his "American World Politics": "The statesmen at Paris were ready in March, 1919, to declare immediate peace, for which the whole world was longing; but since that time there has been projected across the luminary of peace the silhouette of a solitary, implacable figure, sternly forbidding the proclamation that the great war is ended, unless it conforms to the mandate imposed by a single will."

The party pronouncements with regard to the league of nations as found in the rival platforms are alike lacking in the precision and energy that inspire and guide. They are indefinite and they are timorous, but none the less they should be set down side by side for such benefits as comparison may afford. The Republican platform, after a needlessly wordy preamble, says:

The Republican party stands for agreement among the nations to preserve the peace of the world. We believe that such an international association must be based upon international justice, and must provide methods which shall maintain the rule of public right by development of law and the decision of impartial courts, and which shall secure instant and general international conference whenever peace shall be threatened by political action, so that the nations pledged to do and insist upon what is just and fair may exercise their influence and power for the prevention of war.

We believe that all this can be done without compromise of national independence, without depriving the people of the United States in advance of the right to determine for themselves what is just and fair, when the occasion arises, and without involving them as participants and not as peace-makers in a multitude of quarrels, the merits of which they are unable to judge.

The covenant, signed by the President at Paris, failed signally to accomplish this purpose and contained stipulations, not only intolerable for an independent people, but certain to produce the injustice, hostility, and controversy among nations which it proposed to prevent.

That covenant repudiated to a degree wholly unnecessary and unjustifiable the time-honored policy in favor of peace, declared by Washington and Jefferson and Monroe and pursued by all American administrators for more than a century, and it ignored the universal sentiments of America for generations past in favor of international law and arbitration and it rested the hope of the future on mere expediency and negotiation.

The Democratic platform is still more vague and indecisive. Prefacing its declaration by an assertion that the war was won, not by force of arms, but as the result of a "definite assurance to Germany" of the establishment of the league, that Germany in other words was diplomatically bribed to surrender, the platform continues:

We indorse the President's view of our international obligations and his firm stand against reservations designed to cut to pieces the vital provisions of the Versailles treaty and we commend the Democrats in Congress for voting against resolutions for separate peace which would disgrace the nation. We advocate the immediate ratification without reservations which would impair essential integrity; but do not oppose the acceptance of any reservations making clearer or more specific the obligations of the United States to the league associates. Only by doing this we may retrieve the reputation of this nation among the powers of the earth and recover the moral leadership which President Wilson won and which Republican politicians at Washington sacrificed. Only by doing this may we hope to aid effectively in the restoration of order throughout the world and to take the place which we should assume in the front rank of spiritual, commercial, and industrial advancement.

Such are the main issues that will be submitted to the electorate, as to a jury, at the November election. If those issues are to be clarified it is necessary to turn from the shadowy declarations of the platforms to the provisions of the covenant itself, and to study those provisions with at least that same anxious care that would be given to the lease of a house. If America should subscribe to that covenant it would be bound by it literatim et verbatim. The assurances of President or presidential supporters that plain words have other than a plain meaning would avail us not at all. We should be held to the letter of the bond, and rightly so.

The essence of the Covenant is contained in Article X. There are other grave and portentous articles, but this is the most bodeful of them all. It may be quoted in full as follows:

The members of the league undertake to respect and preserve as against external aggression the territorial integrity and existing political independence of all members of the league. In case of any such aggression or in case of any threat or danger of such aggression the council shall advise upon the means by which this obligation shall be fulfilled.

Corollary to this article and of equal import is Article XVI. This also may be quoted:

Should any member of the league resort to war in disregard of its covenants under Article XII, XIII, or XV, it shall ipso facto be deemed to have committed an act of war against all other members of the league, which hereby undertake immediately to subject it to the severance of all trade or financial relations, the prohibition of all intercourse between their nationals and the nationals of the covenant-breaking state, and the prevention of all financial, commercial, or personal intercourse between the nations of the covenant-breaking state and the nationals of any other state, whether a member of the league or not.

These words are not ambiguous. The pledge that they embody can not be evaded except by dishonor. We bind ourselves "to respect and preserve as against external aggression the territorial integrity and existing political independence of all members of the league." The merits of the case, the provocation that may have been given, are not to be considered. There is to be no deliberation and no debate. The action of the league is to be automatic in the coercive preservation of the "existing political independence" of its members, no matter how iniquitous it may be. Under the terms of this article there could have been no freedom for the Poles by foreign aid. Serbia and Bulgaria must have remained under the Turkish scourge lacking the help of Russia. American armies would have been summoned automatically into the service of a dozen hells, and the American government would have had no more than an insignificant voice in the control of its own forces. It would have a single vote in a council of nine, the other eight votes being European and Asiatic.

But the President's defense—if it can be called a defense—of this amazing bond should be cited. Speaking with the Foreign Relations Committee of the Senate on August 19, 1919, the President said: "I understand that article to mean that no nation is at liberty to invade the territorial integrity of another. That does not mean to invade for the purpose of warfare, but to impair the territorial integrity of another nation. Its territorial integrity is not destroyed by armed intervention. It is destroyed by retention, by taking territory away from it, that impairs its territorial integrity." It would seem then that invasion "for purposes of warfare" is not forbidden. To quote again from Dr. Hill: "An enemy might invade any country, so far as this provision for its protection is concerned, take possession of its resources, carry away its portable property, desolate its fields, destroy its mines, and even exterminate its population; but the President declares the obligation of Article X would not be brought into operation until it came to a diplomatic settlement! Then, and then only, would the obligation to 'preserve territorial integrity and political independence' come into operation." No wonder Dr. Hill should say that it is difficult to be patient with such an evasion as this to which no government could resort in practice without losing the respect of mankind, including that of its own people. No such interpretation can be applied to Article X. Its words are explicit. Taken in conjunction with Article XI and Article XVI it means that America becomes automatically a party, a belligerent party, to every national quarrel upon earth, that her army and navy pass from her own control to the control of the council of the league, that the American government abrogates its most vital functions of war and peace, and that the nation becomes a pawn to be moved helplessly and voicelessly on the chessboard at the bidding of a Geneva conclave. Now it may be that we wish to sign a bond of this nature. Time will show. But at least let us know what the bond is.

The Senate reservations should be studied with the same care that is given to the covenant itself. For here lies the dividing line between Republicans and Democrats, a line clearly visible behind the nebulous and evasive terminology. There is no opposition anywhere to a league of nations. It is demanded by the conscience of humanity and for the preservation of the race. The senatorial dissidents have precisely the same sentiments of national benevolence as the rest of us. But they object to so complete a renunciation of American sovereignty. They ask that we be allowed to remain masters in our own house and arbiters of our own action. They decline to allow the nation to be dragged into wars of which it knows nothing and, it may easily be, into the armed defense of wrongs. The reservations imply nothing more than this. They indicate no intention to evade a single responsibility or to refrain from any pacific deed even though it may imply force. But they reserve to America the right of judgment, the right to say for herself, and absolutely to decide for herself, when and how her forces shall be employed. Those reservations are before the public. They are clear and explicit and, moreover, they can be modified. The first reservation gives to America the right to say, in case she should wish to withdraw from the league, whether her obligations have been fulfilled. Is there any American who will dare to say that she ought not to have this right? The second reservation is to the effect that America can not be compelled to go to war under Article X without the consent of Congress. Once more, is there any American who will specifically gainsay this? The third reservation provides that no mandate shall be accepted without the consent of Congress. If the Senate had accepted the treaty and the covenant when they were first presented we should at this moment be sending an army to Armenia to fight the Turks in an unending war just as the Balkans have been fighting the Turks for five hundred years. Reservation 4 gives to America the right to determine what questions are domestic. Reservation 5 exempts the Monroe Doctrine from the interference of the league. We need not consider the rest of the reservations, as they are of a subsidiary nature. No one of them hinders the effective participation of America in the league of nations.

Here, then, is a clear issue. A Democratic victory means adoption of the covenant as it now stands. A Republican victory means adoption of the covenant with reservations that are intended to retain the sovereignty of America within her own borders, over her own army and navy, over the lives of her sons. In asking for these reservations the Senate has fulfilled its sworn duty under the Constitution. To do otherwise would be a betrayal of its duty.

The issue will be decided at the polls, but after a period of acrimony that will be disruptive and disastrous. Once more, the President so wills it, just as he wills the continuation of the state of war with all its volcanic possibilities. But the result is not in doubt. The only argument that the Republicans need use is the display of the original covenant and the reservations that the Senate has recommended. Unless war, with America as a participant, is to be made perpetual, those reservations must be adopted.

Editorial Correspondence.

I found many opportunities in the course of a recent journey to the Atlantic coast to observe the practical workings of prohibition. It was in early June, practically a year after the going into effect of the Eighteenth Amendment and following nearly three years of "war prohibition." Sufficient time under the new order of things had elapsed to indicate the working value of the prohibitive principle. On the train crossing the country I fell in first or last with eleven acquaintances old and new. Of these, five were provided generously with stimulants of Scotch or Kentucky origin. At my hotel in New York I found several friends, at least half of whom had in their rooms materials promotive of conviviality. In private houses in New York there was no lack of the usual accompaniments of generous living. At hotels and clubs alcoholic drinks were not in evidence, but everywhere else there was abundance. It was the same at Washington. At the table of a high official there were served sherry, claret, and champagne. In the private rooms of club members there was the usual supply of liquors of various kinds. I say usual, though perhaps I would better say unusual, for never before have I found invitations so general or generous. On the part of many there seemed a special zest in a hospitality that implied evasion of a law that all seemed delighted to defy and put in contempt.

My personal experiences did not touch commercialized phases of illicit traffic, but I was informed through many sources that in all of the larger towns and cities there are "blind pigs" in sufficient number and sufficiently stocked to answer all demands. The only difference between these and other days is that the traffic is conducted behind closed doors and at prices anywhere from five to ten times above those prevailing in the period prior to the coming in of the prohibition laws. While I was in Philadelphia there appeared in one of the daily papers a statement over the name of the president of a prohibition enforcement league that the law was practically a dead letter in Pennsylvania. There were, he declared, many places in Philadelphia and other cities where liquors of all kinds were sold openly over bars as in other days. The fact he said was known to the authorities, but they could rarely be induced to proceed against violators of the law, and when they did procedures of prosecution were ineffective, public sentiment failing to support such action. He blamed "the politicians," both Republicans and Democrats he said, who sought favor with "a class of voters" by "pandering to their appetites" and their "defiance of law."

My journey did not extend to the south coast. But there, I was told, there was all but open traffic by smugglers between the Southern ports and Cuba. At Palm Beach last winter all that anybody had to do to get liquors was to write out a list of what he wanted, giving it to a hotel porter or a bellboy and pay whatever was demanded, usually three or four times the normal price. In the summer season, when the hotels are practically empty, the traffic is carried on between Cuba and Florida ports on a cheaper basis. A gentleman of my acquaintance told me that upon leaving a Florida hotel for the north in April he had left with a "reliable" bell captain the sum of $2500, with instructions to buy and store for next winter's use a complete stock of liquors. Under the summer schedule of rates he expected to get what he wanted at about double the prices prevailing in pre-prohibition times.

In New York, Washington, and elsewhere prohibition has become a favorite stage joke. At every performance I attended there were references to it intended to be amusing, and in every instance there was hilarious response on the part of the audience. Similarly in private companies there was a constant and running fire of contemptuous persiflage directed at prohibition. Unquestionably there is a large element that takes the matter seriously, but my affiliations did not carry me into these circles. In the convention hall in Chicago references to prohibition were greeted by general laughter, and at one time the vast audience in the Coliseum, including many scores of delegates, joined in the pathetic parody, "Nobody Knows How Dry I Am!"

There is no doubt but that if my interests and occasions had carried me into broader circles—if they had brought me in touch with that large group of people who may be defined, socially as well as religiously, as Methodists, Baptists, Campbellites, and so on—I should have found another phase of sentiment. That there are large and earnest bodies of people morally devoted to the principle of prohibition is obviously true. Such are to be found everywhere, and more particularly apart from the cities in the great Middle West. I suspect that in towns like Shelbyville, Indiana, Adrian, Michigan, and Davenport, Iowa, towns typical of a middling sort of people, throughout the Mississippi and Missouri valleys, a vote on a straight prohibition issue would go four or five to one in favor of the Eighteenth Amendment and of the machinery devised for its enforcement. But in the cities everywhere, especially in the great industrial centres, prohibition is resented and will always be. The classes more or less affiliated with what is known as "fashionable life"—prosperous people habituated to generous living—are almost universally "wet," or at least "damp," in their ideas. Nobody outside the lines of commercial interest, or of the political interest affiliated with it, wants to see return of the saloon. But the general sentiment among the so-called upper classes is for such modification of the Volstead Act as will permit the manufacture and free use of the lighter beverages. Then there is the great industrial class which finds one of the solaces of its life in beer. A man who stands before a furnace fire in a rolling mill eight hours every day can see no reason why he should not have the comfort to be found from time to time in cooling draughts. And he is more eager to enjoy what he deems a right when he sees that his neighbor, with means to buy and with facilities for storage, suffers no inconvenience under the new order of things. He feels that under the present status of prohibition there is privilege for the rich or well-to-do man and denial of it to the relatively poor man. His gorge heaves in knowledge of the fact that he is practically denied that which his less controlled neighbor may have at his pleasure.

A notable effect of prohibition as it works out is in its destruction of respect for law. We have been in the main a law-abiding people. Prohibition is making vast numbers habitual violators of law. Where it is felt that the law infringes upon individual liberty and natural rights there is small conscience or none at all in its evasion. Many who a few years ago would have insisted upon the duty of obeying the law at whatever inconvenience are now resentful of prohibition and contemptuous of it, believing that it was imposed unjustly and by sharp practice and that under it a fanatical minority is seeking to exercise authority over a majority always respectful of common sense and human normality.

The devices by which the law is evaded or nullified are multitudinous. Of stored stocks of liquors there is of course a diminishing quantity. But there are means of replenishment likely to be permanent and sufficient. I have already described the method by which the southeastern coast is supplied by direct importation from Cuba. Similarly liquors are brought in across the northern border. Then there is growing up under concealment a considerable industry of local manufacture. In thousands of cellars there are being brewed beers and ales comparable in quality with the product of the old-time breweries. The moonshine whisky industry has had a tremendous boom, both in its favorite and traditional seats and in thousands of kitchens and cellars the country over. Whisky of a raw type is very easily made, and if the Volstead Act shall become fixed in the permanent law of the country there will undoubtedly be developed domestic stills to be sold at $5 per by which anybody may manufacture whisky in limited quantities. Beverages containing everything desired in the way of "kick"—and something more—may easily be made from cider, grape juice, and other fruit products. In California the price of wine grapes has more than doubled under prohibition. The juice is extracted and sealed hermetically, and sold in canisters to whoever may desire to make his own wine. The method is easy. Leave the canister of grape juice open for a few days and you have a product sufficiently alcoholic for any purpose. Nature will do the trick precisely as she does it with apple juice. True, the product may as it gurgles down one's throat have in it some suggestion of a torchlight procession. Connoisseurs are not likely to give approval to these domestic vintages, but they none the less find favor with those to whom the "kick" is the main requirement.

I was told while crossing the country that the ordinary farm silo is a dependable yielder of an alcoholic product, unsavory to be sure, but none the less acceptable to a considerable class of farm laborers. At the bottom of every silo is to be found a syrupy mass running anywhere from 10 to 30 per cent. in alcoholic content. And this stuff is eagerly consumed by persons not scrupulous about refinements in food and drink. I was told that there is more drunkenness in certain parts of the Middle West from the tappings of barnyard silos than there was from the open liquor traffic in other days. I was further told that many negroes in the South and Southwest have discovered crude ways of producing alcoholic "dopes" and that there is a very general consumption of things vastly more injurious than the standard brews of small alcoholic content popularly consumed previous to prohibition.

As yet nobody may know what the effect of prohibition regarded as a political issue, may be. That both parties are afraid of the question is illustrated by their cowardice in dealing with it. Concerning this, the greatest of all popular issues, both the Republican and Democratic platforms are silent. Perhaps not yet has there been time for sentiment one way or the other to adjust itself to political action. But I have not the first doubt that long before another presidential year comes round parties will have to declare themselves one way or the other. Undoubtedly there are multitudes of people, including great masses of the laboring element, who will vote for any party that will propose a "liberty" policy and against any party that stands pat for prohibition. On the other hand there are multitudes of good people who will hold every other question subordinate to what they believe a supreme issue of morals. From my observations at home and elsewhere I am confirmed in the opinion previously declared in these columns that prohibition in the extreme form defined in the Volstead law will not permanently be sustained. It is fundamentally a violation of the principle of individual liberty. The Volstead Act makes a crime of that which many persons—perhaps a majority—believe to be no crime, and this being so, there is small conscience against its violation. No way has ever been found to indict a whole people; and no way can, we believe, ever be found to make multitudes of people other than resentful of prohibition and disposed through resentment to contempt of the law. Ultimately either the law will be modified or we shall become practically a nation of law-breakers. A. H.

THE VOICE OF THE PRESS.

A Sinn Fein Coup.

(New York Times, June 29th.)

The British army, if one may judge from the contributory negligence of Brigadier-General Cuthbert-Henry Tindall Lucas in allowing himself to be captured by the Sinn Feiners, does not take the state of war in Ireland seriously. Perhaps that is because the government refuses to recognize the Sinn Fein campaign as a military demonstration against the authority of Great Britain. It seems to be the cue to consider the aggressions of the rebels as a series of local disturbances, clownish breaches of the peace, a sort of wild horseplay to be expected of the Irish. "That is just like them," is the official exclamation when the Mullaghmore coast guard station is hurned down, when a small custom house is seized or a post-office is rifled. The street fighting in Londonderry was only a brawl between the Nationalists and the Unionists, to be stopped when there had been enough of it.

British phlegm must not be disturbed by the antics of the Irish. Tempers must be kept, everybody must be stoical—some day the Sinn Feiners will weary of their war upon the British Empire and end by making themselves ridiculous. Then the joke will be upon them. Such seems to be the official view. It is not shared by everybody in Great Britain and Ireland. Most people do not think that the attempt to assassinate Viscount French, the cruel sieges of gallant policemen in their barracks, the murders of officials, the burning of valuable property in rural districts are matters to be complacent about, eulogiums of the Irish temperament to be borne patiently. In the great war conscription was not enforced in Ireland because England dreaded an ugly row in her own household and could not spare soldiers to discipline the refractory. The Sinn Feiners are treated as a big man behaves toward a quarrelsome chap, who wants to make a scene, but is pushed away and told to go about his business. There is no fight in the British in Ireland, although they have troops enough to pacify the country if they cared to use them. The word seems to have gone around that the Sinn Feiners must not be regarded as hellish, but as disorderly characters who are making a nuisance of themselves. It is hoped that they will wear out their welcome in the countryside, when the whole trouble will be over and the soldiers can be withdrawn.

The True Measure of Greatness.

(Boston Transcript.)

After reading those nominating speeches, Washington, Lincoln, Grant, Roosevelt, Julius Caesar, and Napoleon Bonaparte feel like pretty small potatoes.

Transformations.

(Frederick Harrison in Fortnightly Review.)

A portentous sign of the new world in which we live is the suddenness with which rooted ideas are abandoned and dominant changes are made. Reforms that have been fought over for generations pass almost by consent. The franchise is doubled; women have votes and even exceed the male voters; Home Rule is carried by Unionist majorities against the Liberals; Labor becomes the new rich, and the lower middle class, whose "fixed incomes" are now "sinking incomes," become the new poor. Bishops and deans invite Nonconformists to their cathedrals. The Minister of Education welcomes denominationalism to public schools. The House of Lords leads the way in divorce. Socialism is advocated in academic, literary, and aristocratic quarters. The highest empire on earth is transformed into the millennium of labor. And the biggest republic on earth goes "dry" and retires from the world.

(New York Evening Post, June 20th.)

In his articles on the Irish question in our columns Bernard Shaw has argued the case for what is generally known as "home rule all round"; that is, for a constitution applicable to each of the three separate kingdoms of England, Ireland, and Scotland. Federal home rule is by no means a novelty among the many projects which have from time to time been brought forward as a solution of the tangled problem of Anglo-Irish relations. It has constantly been pointed out that England and Scotland, no less than Ireland, suffer from serious disabilities arising out of the existing system of centralized government for the United Kingdom. Mr. Shaw's contribution to the proposal consists in his belief that the British Labor party is to be the chosen instrument of this happy scheme for the settlement of the Irish difficulty and the general improvement of the machinery of government in the British Isles.

Mr. Shaw professes, as a rule, to have few of the illusions of his contemporaries, but he is slightly ingenuous in his desire to credit British labor with qualities of statesmanship of which no evidence is available. If we are to judge by Irish opinion, and more particularly the opinion of Irish labor, the plaintiff in this case is very far from sharing Mr. Shaw's optimistic estimate of the British Labor party's qualifications for solving the Irish problem. When the Irish railroad workers recently "downed tools" on the issue of munition shipments their English colleagues failed to see that there was any analogy between refusing to load munitions for use in Poland against Russia and the Irish refusal to unload munitions for the use of the British Army of Occupation in Ireland.

There is a great deal of vague talk about the miracle-working propensities of labor governments. The public ear is coaxed by the persuasive eloquence of gentlemen who are prepared to guarantee that, once labor is in the saddle, all will be right with the world. Shaw seems guilty of this superstition. He, who is so fond of reminding his fellow-citizens of the disillusioning lessons of the war, does not hesitate to say that the Labor party is "federalist and internationalist," as if English labor, in common with all other European countries, were not still busily engaged in trying to decide which fragment of the shattered International is to be regarded as the true ark of the international covenant.

At the Watervliet Arsenal, New York, the heaviest gun in the world has been named "Big Sam." It is the first wire-bound rifle ever made in the United States and is a heavy navy type. It is wound with about 280 miles of one-eighth inch copper wire. It can hurl a 2400-pound round projectile thirty-one miles. Each round requires 850 pounds of powder. The gun is 68 feet 16 inches long, greatest outside diameter 64 inches, muzzle velocity 2700 feet per second, and it weighs 170 tons. It cost about $200,000.

It is just fifty years since the medical profession was opened to women in Sweden.

INDIVIDUALITIES.

Mrs. Ella Wilson was the first woman mayor. She was elected to that post at Hunnewell, Kansas, in 1911.

The first woman physician to be appointed a medical examiner by any of the large insurance companies was Dr. Anna D. French of New York, in 1882.

Carl Busch of Kansas City has won the prize contest for the best composition for bands by an American composer. The judges were Victor Herbert and Percy Grainger.

In his capacity as Visiting Professor of English at Princeton, Alfred Noyes surveys, with a satiric smile, the modern apostles of disintegration and anarchy in literature. He sees "ten thousand lonely literary rebels, each chained to his most comfortable peak and chanting a perennial song of hate against all institutions."

George Hardie Squire, for ten years assistant society, music, and drama editor of the New York Herald, and the occupant of the same position on the Sun and the New York Herald since the merging of the two newspapers, has resigned his position to become director of publicity for the National Symphony Orchestra.

Frederick C. Freder was certified by the Society of American Artists and the National Academy of Design as the most promising and deserving art student in America. Mr. Freder, who is twenty-five years of age, was presented with the annual art scholarship, having the value of $1500. Mr. Freder has been a student at the National Academy of Design Schools since 1913 except during war service.

Isabella Curl-Piana, coloratura soprano, was born at Riverside and was a graduate of the College of Music, University of Southern California. Several years of study abroad put her in a position to appear before Italian, French, and English audiences in opera, recital, and oratorio. Her voice is high and light, but there is a lyric quality in the lower register, and so she was able to undertake such rôles as Violetta, Gilda, and Dinorah, which she did at the Teatro Nazionale at Rome and at the Dalvermi in Milan.

Louis C. Minette, recently accepted for enlistment in the United States Marine Corps at Tulsa, Oklahoma, said that his mother was an American who married a Frenchman in Italy. He was born on a ship flying the Spanish colors while lying in the English Channel. At the age of five his parents died in Sweden, and he was adopted by a German, who brought him to the United States. His adopted father is not a naturalized citizen. "Would you class him as 'the man without a country'?" said the recruiting sergeant. "Man without a country nothing," said the sergeant, "I'd class him as a league of nations."

On June 24th "The Hermit of the Siskiyous" will celebrate his 100th birthday. Friend of Joaquin Miller and John Burroughs, graduate of Heiöelberg and man of high culture, this white-haired old patriarch has lived in the cabin he built since he came from some Eastern city in 1855. He is known as "Old Man Hooper" to the boys of Waldo, eighteen miles down the trail from his hermitage, but he comes down out of the mountains only twice a year—in the spring on snowshoes and in the fall on his pet burro, Jake—to get provisions. His sixty-five years on the lonely pine-clad mountain side have not made him eccentric. Strangely enough, he likes his fellows, and the interior of his cabin presents a picture of cozy comfort with many of the amenities of modern civilization.

James Metcalfe's resignation as dramatic critic of Life, following thirty-three years' tenure of office, has brought in its trail certain reminiscent gossip of his celebrated break with Klaw & Erlanger, and his resultant exclusion from the K. & E. theatres. It is an exclusion which has continued for sixteen years and is still in force—only a short time ago, in fact, Mr. Metcalfe, as the writer of a syndicate letter on the theatres, inquired of Messrs. Klaw & Erlanger if it were still their intention to bar him from their houses, and learned that it was. True, he has appeared occasionally in one or two of the K. & E. theatres since that time, but always upon the invitation of the star of the moment, and never through the connivance of K. & E. The break dated back to 1904, when the Iroquois Theatre disaster in Chicago brought forth a certain caustic comment by Mr. Metcalfe and his associates on Life. It was a K. & E. theatre playing a K. & E. production, and the climax of Life's attack on the partners was the publication of a cartoon to which particular objection was taken. Thereupon came the severance of relations. Whether or not the ban will be lifted, now that Mr. Metcalfe is no longer the dramatic critic of Life, has not yet been learned.

The town of Runcorn has long claimed Alfred Dodd, the author of "The Ballad of the Iron Cross," as one of its most notable citizens, but he was born in Manchester and spent most of his youth in the "Cottonopolis." His was a dour childhood, for, when he was four years old, he was placed in the keeping of his grandfather, a strange old man of the hardshell type and the last person to be chosen as the mentor of an imaginative and impressionable child. The only other companion of Alfred Dodd's youthful days was the old man's daughter—a deaf mute. After receiving a fragmentary education the boy was taken from school at an early age to learn the prosaic business of pawnbroking. And a pawnbroker he remains today, in spite of sustained efforts at the outset of his career to thrust aside what was to him then an almost loathsome destiny. It has been his ambition to be a teacher, and to this end, during his apprenticeship, he devoted all his spare time to study, reading "everything" and absorbing a multitude of beliefs. For a time he combined newspaper work with his regular vocation, and became the representative, in his native place, of various leading journals. Finally, however, commerce conquered art. A business man Dodd became, and a business man he remains—with intervals.

OLD FAVORITES.

Of, in the Stilly Night.

Of, in the stilly night,
Ere Slumher's chain has bound me,
Fond Memory brings the light
Of other days around me:
The smiles, the tears,
Of boyhood's years,
The words of love then spoken;
The eyes that shone,
Now dimmed and gone,
The cheerful hearts now broken!
Thus in the stilly night,
Ere Slumher's chain has bound me,
Sad Memory brings the light
Of other days around me.

When I remember all
The friends, so linked together,
I've seen around me fall
Like leaves in wintry weather,
I feel like one
Who treads alone
Some banquet-hall deserted,
Whose lights are fled,
Whose garlands dead,
And all but he departed!
Thus in the stilly night,
Ere Slumher's chain has bound me,
Sad Memory brings the light
Of other days around me. —Thomas Moore.

Jim Bludso.

Wall, no! I can't tell whar he lives,
Because he don't live, you see:
Leastways, he's got out of the habit
Of livin' like you and me.
Whar have you been for the last three years,
That you haven't heard folks tell
How Jimmy Bludso passed in his checks,
The night of the Prairie Belle?

He warn't no saint—they engineers
Is pretty much all alike—
One wife in Natchez-under-the-Hill,
And another one here, in Pike,
A keerkless man in his talk was Jim,
And an awkward man in a row—
But he never flunked, and he never lied—
I reckon he never knowed how.

And this was all the religion he had—
To treat his engine well;
Never he passed on the river;
To mind the pilot's bell;
And if ever the Prairie Belle took fire,
A thousand times he swore
He'd hold her nozzle agin the bank
Till the last soul got ashore.

All boats has their day on the 'Mississipp'.
And her day come at last—
The Movastar was a better boat,
But the Belle she wouldn't be passed,
And so she came tearin' along that night,
The oldest craft on the line,
With a nigger squat on her safety-valve,
And her furnace crammed, rosin and pine.

The fire hust out as she clared the bar,
And burnt a hole in the night,
And quick as a flash she turned, and made
For that willer-hank on the right,
There was runnin' and cursin' but Jim yelled out
Over all the infernal roar,
"I'll hold her nozzle agin the hank Till the last galoot's ashore."

Thro' the hot, black breath of the burnin' boat
Jim Bludso's voice was heard,
And they all had trust in his cussedness,
And know'd he would keep his word,
And sure's you're horn, they all got off
Afore the smoke-stacks fell,
And Bludso's ghost went up alone
In the smoke of the Prairie Belle.

He warn't no saint—but at judgment
I'd run my chance with Jim
'Longside of some pious gentlemen
That wouldn't shook hands with him.
He seen his duty, a dead sure thing—
And went for it thar and then:
And Christ aint a-going to lie too hard
On a man who died for men. —John Hay.

Before the world war the American government's expenses amounted to $1,000,000,000 a year. Now as high as $6,000,000,000 is the estimated necessary outlay. A few years ago the government had 10,000 civil servants; now its civil servants number 800,000.

Carlsbad, the famous health resort, is built on a crust, underneath which is a subterranean lake of boiling water, and all the hot sulphur springs have to be ceaselessly watched and the pressure kept down lest the town be destroyed.

MY THREE YEARS IN AMERICA.

Count Bernstorff Narrates the Leading Events in His Career as German Ambassador.

Count Bernstorff's book is the most important discussion of the war from the German point of view that has yet appeared. Indeed it is the only presentation of German policies that has been given to us by a German statesman. Count Bernstorff, it is true, was in America, and therefore not in intimate touch with the Berlin government. Indeed he was sometimes in sharp disagreement with it. None the less he was the spokesman of Germany during the war. He represented all that we knew of the German mind at that time. If his narrative were now to be supplemented, as doubtless it will be, by a book by Bethmann-Hollweg or Von Jagow, we should have a complete story of German policies of quite exceptional interest.

Count Bernstorff's book, so far as it relates to ascertainable facts, will of course be subjected to close scrutiny and to comparison with American and other records. But in the meantime a rapid survey of its pages discloses much of interest both in the way of conjecture, characterization, and summary. Thus the author believes that an alliance with England might have been made at the cost of Russia. He tells us, or rather his German readers, that the American does not judge events from a cold and business-like point of view, but "partly under the guidance of merely emotional values." Elsewhere he compares the American with an hysterical woman with whom it is useless to argue. His comments are often shrewd and often bitter, suggestive of contempt and anger.

German propaganda in America was a failure, says the author. It was misguided from Berlin. But Dr. Dernburg did the best that was possible and he succeeded in obtaining the cooperation of the Irish leaders—a point that may be emphasized at the present time:

Dr. Dernburg, then, had not a chance during the eight months of his activity in America of transforming her into a pro-German country, and it is certain that no one else could have done it in his place. But he succeeded to a great extent, and within a comparatively short time, in more or less crippling the enemy propaganda, and at least in gradually rendering ineffective the grossest misrepresentations of our enemies. By his own writings and other methods of spreading the truth, and particularly by the numerous brochures and hooks, which at his suggestion were written by American supporters of the German cause and distributed in thousands directly or indirectly by the Press Bureau with the help of a skilfully compiled address book, he succeeded in exerting very considerable influence. By keeping in touch with American journalists and other influential persons he did much good work, particularly in the first months of the war. His connection with Irish leaders laid the foundation for a cooperation which in the following year was of great importance to our position in the United States, and which, with a somewhat more intelligent backing by our government departments at home, might have been more fruitful still.

The author has much to say about President Wilson. Germany, we are told, "hailed Mr. Wilson as the Messiah who was to save Germany and the whole world from dire distress." Mr. Wilson is the "perfect type of the American politician":

He certainly tries to direct and influence public opinion. But he changes his front at once if he notices that he has strayed from the way that the aura popularis would have him follow. In order to form a correct judgment of Mr. Wilson's actions and speeches it is always necessary to ask oneself, in the first place, what end he has in view for his own political position and that of his party in America. He proclaims in a most dazzling way the ideals of the American people. But their realization always depends on his own actual political interests and those of the Democratic party. Mr. Wilson's attitude has always been synonymous with that of his party, because the latter can produce no other personality capable of competing with the President. Therefore, Mr. Wilson always met with little or no opposition within the Democratic party, and he was able to follow for a long time his own inclination to adopt a quite independent policy.

The count has much to say about German conspiracies in America. He complains of the methods employed by the prosecution and arraigns the character of the witnesses, who were usually Germans who had severed all ties with their own countries and wished to secure their footing with the new:

In any case I myself was never a partner to any proceedings which contravened the laws of the United States. I never instigated such proceedings, nor did I consciously afford their authors assistance, whether financially or otherwise. I was in no single instance privy to any illegal acts, or to any preparations for such acts. Indeed, as a rule I heard of them first through the papers, and even then scarcely believed in the very existence of most of the conspiracies for which I was afterwards held accountable. I shall hardly be blamed for this by any one who remembered the number of projects which we were all duly accused of entertaining, such as the various alleged plans for the invasion of Canada with a force recruited from the German-American rifle clubs, and many another wildcat scheme attributed to us in the first months of the war.

The attempt to embroil America with Mexico and Japan receives some scanty attention in these pages. We are told that Mr. Hale "when he was acting in collaboration with us" stipulated that nothing should be done to inflame America and Japan, and Dr. Dernburg assented:

In order to avoid misunderstanding, I wish expressly to state that I do not deny that instructions were sent by Zimmermann, the Secretary of State, to our Embassy in Mexico, which envisaged cooperation with that country against the United States as well as an understanding with Japan, but must point out that this was recommended in the event—and only in the event—of the United States declaring war on us.

The German mind was never better displayed than by the author's comparison of the British blockade with the German submarine war. That the former involved no loss of life and that the latter involved wholesale murder seems not to have occurred to him:

The chief germ of dissension lay in the fact that the British blockade, which was defended by its authors as being merely an extension of the rights of sea warfare to square with the progress of the modern military machine, was met on America's part only by paper protests, while our own extension of the same rights by means of submarine warfare was treated as a casus belli. At a later period of the war the Imperial Government made certain proposals to the United States; who, might, by accepting them, have safeguarded all their commercial and shipping interests, not to mention the lives of their citizens, to the fullest possible extent, and yet have allowed us a free field for our submarine warfare. These proposals the United States rejected; thus she set herself to combat with all her strength any continuance of the blockade restrictions through our submarines, while conniving at the similar restrictions exercised by England, although these latter infringed far more seriously the rights of neutral powers.

Reporting to Berlin on April 4, 1916, the author refers to the sinking of the Sussex. He warns his government that President Wilson "will, as usual, be in a fearful hurry and bring us to the brink of war." He will view the matter, he says, "exclusively from the standpoint of the approaching presidential election." Continuing the dispatch, he says:

Except for the surprises that are usual over here, things are at present quite calm. This is due, in the first place, to the desire for peace shown by the population, who are not anxious to be disturbed in their congenial occupation of money-making, and secondly, to the development of the Mexican question. This latter question stands in the forefront of public interest, and it seems to be increasingly probable that the punitive expedition against Villa will lead to a full-dress intervention. A few days ago it was reported that Villa was defeated, then wounded, and finally even a prisoner. All this good news proved later to be false, and now Villa is said to have escaped south and won over fresh supporters. So long as the Mexican question holds the stage here we are, I believe, safe from an act of aggression on the part of the American government.

Later on we find another reference to German propaganda, and one of commendable frankness:

Here I may touch on another question which was engaging my attention at that time. Since the Lusitania catastrophe I had adopted the principle, and put it into practice as far as possible, of leaving the propaganda to our American friends, who were in a position to get an earlier hearing than we, and in any case understood the psychology of the Americans better than the Imperial German agents. Indeed, the words "German propagandist" had already become a term of abuse in America. We were reproached there with being too indulgent, while in Germany the opposite criticism was leveled at us. In spite of the difficulty of the situation, however, there were Americans of German and other origin, who had the courage openly to champion our cause and to swim against the stream. Among others, a "Citizens' Committee for Food Shipments" was formed, whose activities spread through the whole country, and were avowedly pro-German. A special function of the committee with Dr. von Mach as executive chief, was a month of propaganda throughout the country, with the object of obtaining the means to supply the children of Germany with milk. The English control of the post even led to the bold plan of building a submarine to run the milk through the English blockade. The propaganda was very rigorously attacked by the greater part of the American press, but pursued its course unafraid, collected money, submitted protests to the State Department against the attitude of the Entente, and so on.

Germany always misunderstood the situation in America, says the author. Propaganda was thereby made difficult and the German cause suffered:

At the time of which I am speaking occurred also the much-discussed Bolo affair. It is quite astonishing how many lies were told before the commission of inquiry of the American Senate with regard to this affair. Among others, hotel servants, chauffeurs, etc., were sworn, and gave evidence that I had met Bolo in the apartments of Mr. Hearst. True I have often visited Mr. Hearst, which goes without saying, as he was the only important newspaper proprietor who maintained a neutral attitude throughout the war. I did not, however, meet Bolo, either there or anywhere else; I have never made his acquaintance, or even seen him in the distance. I heard his name for the first time when he was brought up for trial in Paris.

If the statements made before the commission of inquiry are to be relied on in any point at all, it is to be assumed that Bolo first came to America to arrange a combine between the Journal and the Hearst Press. This combine was to support the cause of Pacifism after the war. Who Bolo's principal was I do not know, but so much seems to be established, that he was connected with the Journal. Apparently, Bolo wanted to sell shares in this paper to Mr. Hearst, in order to acquire funds for the Pacifist agitation. This theory seems justified since Bolo, on the voyage to America, got into touch with Mr. Bartelli, Hearst's representative in Paris. The latter did fall in with Bolo's ideas.

The author makes many shrewd valuations of the situation in America. Cabling to Berlin on October 11, 1916, he says that Wilson is anxious to make peace "because in that case he would have been sure of being reelected." If reelected without this he would have to take the initiative himself. To this he received the following reply from Bethmann-Hollweg:

Demand for unrestricted submarine campaign increasing here with prolongation of war and improbability of decisive military blow, without, however, shaking the government's attitude.

Direct request for Wilson's mediation still impossible, in view of favor hitherto shown to Entente, and after last speeches of Asquith and Lloyd George. Spontaneous appeal for peace, towards which I again ask you to encourage him, would be gladly accepted by us. You should point out Wilson's power, and consequently his duty, to put a stop to slaughter. If he can not make up his mind to act alone he should get into communication with Pope, King of Spain, and European neutrals. Such joint action, since it can not be rejected by the Entente, would insure him reelection and historical fame.

The count denies that he tried to influence German-Americans to secure the election of Wilson. On the other hand he was charged with favoring Hughes in order to punish Wilson:

I never for a moment denied that I personally should be glad to see Mr. Wilson reelected, as I was convinced that he had the determination and the power to bring about peace. It was at that time impossible for me to foresee that our government would change its attitude to this question. All American pacifists belonged to the Democratic camp, all militarists belonged to the Republican party.

In December, 1911, the author prepared a report on the attitude of the American press toward Germany and the other belligerent nations, a report in which he expresses the gratitude of Germany to Mr. Hearst:

On the other side the consistently friendly attitude of the ten papers of the Hearst syndicate, which come daily into the hands of more than three million readers in all parts of the country, has of late become even much more friendly as a result of the English boycott of the International News Service and the exclusion of all the Hearst publications from circulation in Canada. Mr. Hearst has replied to the inconceivably short-sighted policy of the British authorities towards his news service in a series of forcible, full-page leading articles against the British censorship which must have seriously shaken the confidence, apart from this already weakened long ago, of the American Press in all news coming from England. Not only did the articles in question contain a crushing criticism of the English system of suppressing and distorting the truth, but they also proved that for years America had been misled systematically from London in its judgment of foreign nations—e. g., the "degenerate" French. Apart from this the Hearst newspapers repeatedly explained in detail how in the autumn of 1916 the position of the Central Powers was excellent, while that of England and her allies was completely hopeless. It should be emphasized, however, that the Hearst newspapers are, nevertheless, not blindly pro-German, for they publish a good deal that can hardly be desirable for us—e. g., occasional articles on the "German Peril," for which new food was provided by the exploits of the Deutschland, and more especially U-53, and was exploited here to support the idea of increasing the army and navy. The papers named are based on a sound American policy, but with their sharp, anti-English tendency do us much more good than papers with admitted pro-German bias. The chief value of the pro-German attitude of the organs of the Hearst syndicate lies in the fact that their influence is not limited to any particular town or district, but extends over the whole Union. An English critic, S. K. Ratcliffe, recently wrote about American newspapers in the Manchester Guardian. . . . "Northern papers are of no account in the South; the most influential New York journals do not exist for the people of the Pacific Coast, and carry little weight in the Middle States. Hence, summaries of opinion—confined to a small number of papers published east of the Mississippi—are imperfectly representative of the republic." This accurately observed geographical limitation of the influence of the leading American newspapers is substantially overcome by the Hearst organization, for the leading articles which appear in the New York American today will appear tomorrow in the allied papers of Boston, Chicago and Atlanta, and the day after in San Francisco and Los Angeles.

The count had high hopes that America would force a peace conference by placing an embargo on exports. He expresses this hope in a telegram to Berlin dated January, 1917, in which he says that both the President and Colonel House "praise the Hearst press article," demanding such a conference:

From the above it is clear that we can not afford to have any difficulties over the old U-boat question. As regards the question of armed merchant vessels, I hope to arrive at a modus vivendi. But we must be careful not to act hastily and carelessly, so as not to create conflict before the President has taken further steps. Remarkable as this may sound to German ears, Wilson is regarded here very generally as pro-German. His note was traced to our influence, and Gerard's speech strengthened this impression. This speech is in accordance with instructions which Mr. Gerard is receiving. Our present enemies have gone literally raving mad, and leave no stone unturned in order to put obstacles in Wilson's way. This explains the attacks against the President, as also the scurrilous attempt engineered by the Republicans to charge the Administration with Stock Exchange speculations. Without any justification, of course, my name also was mentioned in this regard. The German Embassy, as is well known, is held responsible for everything by our enemies in this country.

Count Bernstorff returned to Germany only to find himself at sharp variance with the German military chiefs, who were then in the position of dictators. Some sharp words passed between him and Ludendorff, and he was given to understand that he would not again be employed in the foreign service of his country. Republics, it would seem, have no monopoly of ingratitude.

MY THREE YEARS IN AMERICA. By Count Bernstorff. New York: Charles Scribner's Sons; $5.

From Sonora to Yucatan in Mexico more than fifty separate dialects are spoken. All the inhabitants of the West Coast, however, with the exception of some hill tribes of Indians, can understand Spanish. Of these Indians the 8000 Yaquis, with their crude Bacatete hill forts, their weird ceremonial masque dances and their warlike attitude, are easily most conspicuous. Many are enlisted with the Federal army or employed as ranch hands and mine or railroad laborers. The Yaquis with the Federal troops are termed "Manzos," or "tame" Yaquis; those in the hills, wild and hostile, are the "Bronchos." The latter are a vagrant lot, robbing ranches for food and animals, carrying rawhide drums and water gourds, wearing sandals of green cowskins—living by their wits. Pressed by hunger, they subsist as well on burros as beef.

Nine thousand five hundred acres of forest are being cut down every day of the year simply for pulp for paper manufacture.

BANKING AND INVESTMENT NEWS.

San Francisco bank clearings for the week ending July 3, 1920, were $167,900,000; for the corresponding week of 1919, $116,900,000; a gain of $51,000,000.

Total gold reserves of the local Federal Reserve Bank decreased $12,558,000 to $168,200,000 during the week end July 2d, according to the bank's weekly statement issued Saturday, July 3d. Gold held by member banks fell off $9,256,000.

Resources gained $5,138,000 to $423,273,000, while total earning assets increased $14,559,000 to $209,101,000 and bills on hand rose $13,351,000 to $194,056,000.

Increased discount rates can hardly be expected to do more than check further borrowing, according to the National Bank of Commerce in New York, until the railroad

The general industrial situation is exceedingly erratic. Not a few factories have closed down or are working only part time in a good many trades, particularly in the general textile industries. This is in response to the readjustment going on in the credit situation and the tendency of the public to curtail its extravagant buying.

The unrest in business finds some of the underlying trades increasingly active, however, and it is to be hoped the readjustment will bring such increase in production of necessities as may result in diminished costs of living. The big thing, however, is the failure of labor generally to measure up to any degree of efficiency, encouraged as it is by union agitators to insist upon an increasing compensation for a diminishing amount of toil.

Prices are rising in the steel trade as a whole, notwithstanding rapidly increasing production. Indeed, the trade is swinging into a greater rate of production than at any time since the armistice.

The shortage of railway equipment throughout the world and the outstanding proposition that at least many of our economic ills may be traced to transportation difficulties point to an enormous underlying demand for steel that promises to continue for several years. The president of one of the locomotive companies returned recently from Europe, after consummating a deal involving the exchange of tens of millions of dollars' worth of locomotives for oil, and, notwithstanding the apparent bankrupt condition of the Central Powers of Europe, it will prove a mere matter of Yankee ingenuity to extend this business of barter profitably. When Europe comes to understand that toil will be compensated by food and other necessities and something more there will be less whimpering about bankrupt conditions over there.

Metals generally have been stiffening in the markets of late, and this has followed some rather severe price collapses, especially in tin. With the steel mills active almost all metals will be affected favorably.

There was a decision rendered in Rochester the other day against the Amalgamated Clothing Workers of America for a permanent injunction against picketing and $100,000 strike damages in favor of a clothing company. The court at some length placed itself on record as refusing to countenance monopoly, whether of labor or capital. The plain, ordinary, common people of the United States will be very encouraged at this decision and will follow the case hopefully as it comes up for consideration in higher courts.

Labor agitators have a way of making themselves very obnoxious to the majority of people, especially during a year of great political activity, when they are prone to put forward their claims by way of demands flanked by all manner of threats against the body politic. The talk of a third party is to be disregarded so far as the results next November are concerned. There are already a great many parties in the field, but the next campaign will be fought out by the Democrats and Republicans and, so far as Wall Street is concerned, it has every reason to believe that the successful candidate will be favorable to a safe and sane policy in the administration of public affairs.

Gold imports to help in the settlement of the Anglo-French maturities should ease materially the credit situation during the important crop-moving period. The Interstate Commerce Commission is reaching the end of the hearings in regard to railway rates, and it is to be hoped that the decision granting the railroads a right to charge living rates will not be postponed for long.

The recent actions of the directors of the Great Northern and Northern Pacific railroads in maintaining their stocks on a 7 per cent. dividend basis have reassured the confidence of railway investors generally, which had been sadly shaken by the Chicago and Northwestern episode.

Intrinsically considered, there is not a railroad stock on the list that is not worth a great deal more than it is selling for and, now that peace has prevailed for nearly two years, certainly we should be getting around to the point where railroad stocks will turn the corner for some very radical advance to discount these actual values and a new era of prosperity which it is to be hoped they will soon enter.

Bullish activity continues here and there on the stock market. The equipment companies are overrun with business and are really afraid to take too many foreign orders lest domestic demands suffer. Consequently there is persistent buying in this group of stocks, with Baldwin Locomotive lending itself to very sharp movements as traders pull and haul. The bulk of Baldwin Locomotive holdings, however, seems in very strong hands, and hands that are willing to hold on until a capital readjustment has been made that will permit a more adequate discounting of its real value.

The new president of Mexico has delivered himself of some very favorable ideas regarding this country and the closer relationship which he thinks should obtain between the United States and his own land. Let us trust that his fine promises will be made good. At any rate, confidence has increased among American investors in Mexico, and very big things are expected in the oil regions in the near future, as drilling operations are more extensive than has been the case for many months and actual shipments are at a point where all records should be broken soon. There is scarcely any country in the world of the same size which has greater resources either in agricultural or mineral wealth than Mexico, and a virile, honest, efficient government there would be followed by an era of tremendous prosperity which would be reflected in many ways in Wall Street.—The Financier.

The report from the San Francisco Clearing House shows that the bank clearings for the first six months of 1920 amounted to $4,022,812,973. This is the second highest figure for bank clearings for any half-year in the history of San Francisco, and is almost the same as for the last six months of 1919, the previous high record, when the total bank clearings were $4,126,296,493.

The block of $275,000 6 per cent. bonds of Delta Farms Reclamation District No. 2044, which were offered for bidders on Wednesday, were sold to the district itself, which will put the securities into its treasury. The legal clause which forbade their sale at under 90 prevented the bonds from being worth while at present. The district probably will hold them until the market for them appreciates, according to E. R. Elliott of the William R. Staats Company.

There are seven reclamation districts in Contra Costa and San Joaquin counties interested in the complete issue of 6 per cent. serial bonds authorized. Taking the various districts, Nos. 2024-2030, both inclusive, maturities are as follows: 1928, $300,000; 1929, $306,000; 1930-35, both inclusive, $298,000 annually; 1936, $271,000; 1937, $169,000; 1938, $44,000.

E. H. Rollins & Sons and Gilbert H. A. Rech, representing locally Harris, Forbes & Co., are offering Pen Public Service Corporation first and refunding mortgage 7½ per cent. fifteen-year bonds, due 1935, at 95½ and interest to yield over 8 per cent.

This public utility operates an electric light and power system serving over fifty communities in Western Pennsylvania and reports annual net earnings of more than twice bond interest charges. The offering is an interesting example of the present exceptional opportunities to purchase bonds returning an unusually high yield over a long term of years.

The consolidation between Mercantile National Bank of San Francisco, Mercantile Trust Company of San Francisco, and Savings Union Bank and Trust Company will become effective on the morning of Tuesday, July 6, 1920, says Manager Frederick H. Colburn in a letter to members of the local Clearing House Association.

The name of the new consolidated bank will be Mercantile Trust Company.

Mercantile Trust Company of San Francisco was formerly a member of the San Francisco Clearing House Association (with No. 26) and was succeeded by Mercantile National Bank of San Francisco (with same number), which institution will be succeeded as a Clearing House member by Mercantile Trust Company, which retains the Clearing House number 26.

The principal place of business of Mercantile Trust Company will be 464 California Street.

The branch to be maintained at Grant Avenue and O'Farrell Street will be known as Mercantile Trust Company Savings Union Branch.

At the conference in Washington last May of the bankers of the country with the Federal Reserve Board there were emphatic warnings as to the growing strain on credit due to advancing prices and wages, curtailed production, and expanding loans. Governor Harding of the board estimated the expansion of banking credit properly attributable to the war at $11,000,000,000, while money in circulation had increased $1,900,000,000. Liberty bonds had fallen so far in current quotations that certain issues were selling on a basis of no less than 6.30 per cent. return. It was made clear that either credit must be reduced more rapidly than production is diminished, or production must be increased at a rate greater than the expansion of credit. Following these warnings came on May 29th a drastic vertical raise in the Federal Reserve Bank's discount rate. The New York institution established its discount rate at 7 per cent., the fourth consecutive increase since last November in the campaign to put the brakes on inflation. On all commercial papers, except bankers' acceptances, member banks of the Federal Reserve system must now pay 7 per cent., as against 5½ per cent. last November, when the rate increases began. The rate on advances secured by Liberty bonds has been raised from 5 to 6 per cent. and those on United States treasury certificates from 5 to 5½ per cent. different method is being used to slow up the expansion of credit. Here there are varying discount rates increasing as any individual borrowing bank increases its discounts, thus penalizing those who borrow beyond a certain limit.

Some interesting testimony was introduced in the rate hearings last month before the Interstate Commerce Commission as to the actual physical value of the railroads. It will be remembered that it is a basic premise of the advocates of the Plumb plan that the roads are probably really worth some $8,000,000,000 less than the figures of their "property accounts" show. As the Esch-Cummins bill provides for rates to produce 5½ or 6 per cent. on the actual fair value of the railroads, this question of a genuine appraisal of the properties becomes all-important at present and really the deciding question between the sufficiency or insufficiency of the rates prescribed situation improves so as to permit prompt liquidation of commercial and agricultural credits. In its money market discussion in the July number of its magazine, Commerce Monthly, the bank declares that the present partial breakdown of transportation, by interfering with the movement of products, has prevented the liquidation of a tremendous volume of credits such as is normally effected at this season of the year.

"During the period from May 16th to June 15th," the bank points out, "the money market has experienced continued tension which, largely as a consequence of the traffic situation, had become pronounced during the preceding month. The strain on credit facilities has been reflected in a further general advance in money rates. While some improvement of the traffic situation, mainly potential rather than actual, has been accomplished, it has not proceeded sufficiently to release any considerable part of the credit which has been locked up, and traffic conditions can be expected to improve only slowly. Meanwhile the credit requirements of a new crop movement will become pressing in the not distant future.

"Until the railroad situation improves sufficiently to afford an adequate physical basis for the prompt liquidation of commercial and agricultural credits, the increased discount rates adopted by many of the Federal Reserve Banks can hardly be expected to do more investigation sufficiently broad and representative to be of service.

In the testimony presented to the Commerce Commission last month, however, an officer of the carriers' valuation committee made public the government's determination of the value of fifty railroad systems, aggregating 51,853 miles, showing that their cost of reproduction even at 1914 prices would be $3,203,782,543, while their property investment accounts showed $3,158,275,156 carried on the books of the companies. On the basis of present prices of construction instead of those obtaining six years ago the current valuation of their properties would obviously be many billions greater. The spokesman for the carriers said that railway experts believe the completed valuation report will show the properties to be worth at least $2,000,000,000 in excess of their capitalization and $6,000,000,000 more than the present market value of their stocks and bonds. The aggregate railway investment claimed by the carriers in these hearings is $20,616,000,000.—Review of Reviews.

Bradford, Weeden & Co. announce the removal of their offices from 404 Insurance Exchange Building to 616 in the same building, where they are much more favorably located to serve their clientele.

George H. Burr & Co. are offering $8,000,000 Utah-Idaho Sugar Company first mortgage serial 7 per cent. golds bonds in denominations of $1000 and $500. Redeemable at 101 and accrued interest on any interest date upon sixty days' notice in whole or in series. Interest payable without deduction for Federal income taxes now or hereafter deductible at the source not in excess of 2 per cent.

The Utah-Idaho Sugar Company is one of the three largest beet-sugar producers in the United States, ranking with the American Beet Sugar Company and the Great Western Sugar Company. It has total net assets of $32,776,424 and its average earnings for the four years ending February 28, 1920, were $3,123,943 per annum, or nearly six times the maximum interest charges on their issue of 7 per cent. bonds.

These bonds will be secured by closed first mortgage on all of the land, buildings, machinery, and equipment of the company (except farm lands exempted to facilitate transfer or lease to farmers, if desired), subject only to a purchase money obligation of $600,000 on the factory at Delta, Utah.

The mortgage will cover fifteen sugar factories located in Utah, Idaho, and Washington, all engaged in manufacturing and refining granulated beet sugar. These properties have been appraised as of June, 1920, at $20,642,000, by the Dyer Company, engineers.

As additional security the company will covenant that during the life of these bonds it will maintain current assets as defined in the mortgage equal to at least 100 per cent. of all liabilities, including the principal amount of this issue at the time outstanding.

As a result of the war and of the inflation which followed it the United States promises to become better insured than ever before, says the New York Journal of Commerce, though just now the country is more underinsured than it was five years ago, as the increase in values has been more rapid than the increase in insurance rates to protect them. Proceeding, this observer says:

"When in the earlier years of the war industrial activity was stimulated by war orders from abroad prospective profits become so great that those who expected to make them could take no unnecessary chances of losing them. Accordingly they were readily induced to take various classes of insurance to which they had previously paid little or no attention, such as explosion, war-cover, fire use and occupancy, steam-boiler use and occupancy, and some other forms. Farm crops became so valuable that in districts where hail damage was imminent the prudent farmer had to take more hail insurance per acre. The increased value of live stock created additional demand for live stock insurance. As the need of insurance of these various kinds became greater the ability to pay for it increased even faster.

"With advancing prices and wages, fire, tornado, burglary, personal accident, and health insurance had to be increased if the assured was to be reasonably protected, and as the purchasing power of the dollar decreased men who were providing for their families through life insurance had to increase their lines. The discontinuance of building operations had made leases so valuable and rentals so high as to create a marked demand for leasehold and rent insurance. With the resumption of building operations, high cost of material and labor, and uncertainty as to the ability to get either made it the more necessary to require bonds from contractors.

"Meanwhile, insurance and surety companies and agencies have enlarged their organizations in order to handle the greatly increased volume of business. As values become stationary and eventually begin to decline they will put forth the greater efforts to keep up the volume of business they are organized to handle. As insurance has not increased in volume as rapidly as values, partly because of inertia and oversight and partly because the assured did not realize how greatly their property had appreciated in value, so when values decline the same factors will operate to retard the reduction in the amount of insurance carried. The public having been educated to carry insurance of previously little-known kinds and agents being increasingly active in their efforts to keep up their volume of business, values will be more fully protected by insurance than ever before in the country's history."

The Freeman, Smith & Camp Company is participating in an offering of $25,000,000 Government of Switzerland twenty-year 8 per cent. gold bonds—coupon bonds in denominations of $500 and $1000. Both principal and interest on these bonds will be payable without deduction for any taxes established or levied by or within the Swiss Confederation. These bonds will be the direct obligation of the Government of Switzerland.

The general debt of Switzerland is about $360,000,000. In addition the government has incurred or assumed a total debt of about $386,000,000, including this issue, in the acquisition of 1758 miles of railroad, more than one-half of the total mileage in Switzerland. In normal years the railroads have shown a substantial profit considerably in excess of the annual requirements for interest and sinking funds. The railroads are kept in first-class physical condition, and the methods of accounting are believed to be highly conservative.

Switzerland is considered one of the wealthiest countries in Europe. National wealth, comprising both private and public property, was officially estimated in 1913 at $4,400,000,000, or $1135 per capita (1913 population). If allowance should be made for recapitalization of wealth in accordance with present level of prices, this figure should probably be over $6,000,000,000, showing a per capita wealth of about $1400. Swiss capital invested abroad was estimated in 1913 at $1,250,000,000.

Production in the steel and iron trade holds up at a rather remarkable rate in comparison with what is going on in most industries. Transportation difficulties have increased latterly and some people are prone to think that the steel concerns are anxious to lay up large stores of their products against possible labor troubles later on of greater extent than those of last year.

However, when the railway equipment concerns are loaded up with all the orders they care to take and most countries in the world are standing in line in order to book their enormous demands, it usually means that the steel trade will be most prosperous in its turn. Prices are the subject of considerable difference of opinion just now. There are no such fancy premiums for prompt-delivery steel as were ruling a short while since, and the Steel Corporation holds steadfastly to the government schedules of the spring of 1919. Yet pig-iron is selling in the open market around $45 per ton as compared with the "government price" of $27.75. Presumably the United States Steel Corporation is not selling pig-iron at any such figures as the government suggested. Yet it is selling steel, or booking orders, at prices based more or less on $27.75 iron. Probably the bulk of its orders are variable as to price, but it is evident that either pig-iron is abnormally high at $45 or the government's steel price schedule is ridiculously low. Possibly some middle path will develop later.

Costs of the War.

Let us hope that the Recording Angel will attribute to ignorance the dire offense of those who ask why Europe does not get to work and produce. Mr. Homer Folks supplies the answer in this substantial volume. He was chief of the Department of Civilian Relief of the American Red Cross. He saw a large part of a continent devastated by the human cyclone, veritably ripped and torn to tatters, its soil poisoned with gas and metal, a wilderness more desolate and more hopeless than any of the relatively kindly deserts of nature. Machinery and live stock had disappeared. There was grain neither for food nor planting. Once populous towns were represented by holes in the blackened ground, and unnumbered thousands of people were homeless and starving, victims to the pestilences that followed in the wake of war and rapidly sinking into incurable apathy.

But Mr. Folks gives us no mere catalogue of horrors. Indeed he seems to avoid them so far as possible. But he gives us facts so far as facts are necessary to his presentation of conditions. He confines himself largely to Serbia, Belgium, France, Italy, and Greece. Serbia, he tells us, lost from all causes 1,188,000 persons, including 150,000 from typhus. In France the death rate rose from 27.73 per 1000 in 1915 to 41.55 per 1000 in 1918. Births in the uninhabited departments fell from 604,811 in 1913 to 399,041 in 1918. The excess of deaths over births rose from 53,327 in 1914 to 389,575 in 1918, or a total excess of deaths over births of 1,272,735 for the five years. Italy's losses from all causes were extremely heavy, amounting to 2,877,000, including the deficit in births. In the year 1918 alone she lost 540,000 people from influenza, which may certainly be counted as a war disease.

War, says Mr. Folks, and with good reason, is the negation of all the race has striven for through all the centuries. It denies that life is worth while. The changes that it must bring are only vaguely in sight. The world will either be more democratic or more imperialistic, but as yet it is not clear which. It is a time for the searching of national consciences and for the mutual bearing of national burdens.

Theodore Roosevelt.

The author, the Rev. Russell J. Wilbur, is described in a preface as "wholly a Catholic, partly a Tory, very much a Progressive," and his poems as "political portraiture." There are 38 of these sonnets and they are all somewhat in the nature of rhapsodies, although not wholly uncritical. Perhaps the citation of a single example will best illustrate their temper and scope. It is entitled "T. R. Dionysus":
Iacchos! Iacchos! heartening Vine,
Spirit of Ecstasy, mantic descend;
Make of our sloth and our cowardice end
When through our veins runs thy maddening wine.
Break down the barriers behind which repine
Powers long pent up which yearn for release;
Give to the humdrum of habit surcease,
Exhilaration, elation, divine.

"Iacchos! Iacchos! charlatan drunk!"—
Thus bellowed round thee the plutocrat ring;
Pompous nonentities all in a funk,
Smitten as liars in far Islipening;
Varlets in torpor conservative sung
Ken not thy bacchanals rightly to sing.

This is not poetry, but rather a sort of musical frenzy. And were the plutocrats "all in a funk"? At least they have made a speedy recovery.

British Airships.

In this volume the author gives us a brief history of the airship as it has been developed in the various countries of the world with a brief survey of its possibilities in peace and war. Particularly useful is the exact information as to the carrying power of the airship and its fuel limitation. The book is freely illustrated.

BRITISH AIRSHIPS PAST, PRESENT AND FUTURE. By George Whale, late major, R. A. F. New York: John Lane Company.

Birds.

Mr. W. H. Hudson writes an apology instead of an introduction for his new book about birds. Dozens of books about birds are written every year and there are many observers who know how to study bird life with sympathy and intelligence. But the average mortal knows nothing about birds even though he think himself a bird lover. He has yet to experience the delight of having bird friends, of establishing such confidence with members of the tribe as to permit of close and intimate observation. How many of us, for instance, can accurately describe any bird at all. Thus Mr. Hudson tells us of a friend who enthusiastically described to him a bird visitor about the size of a thrush with a long sharp yellow beak, the entire plumage of a very dark purple and green color, so glossy that it sparkled like silver in the sunshine and sprinkled all over with minute white and cream colored spots. He was rather unhappy when told that it was a starling. He had seen starlings in flocks, but never before at close quarters.

Mr. Hudson has not written a "scientific" book, but rather a sort of autobiography, a series of intimate character sketches of some of the birds that he has known. Some of his stories would have been incredible a few years ago, but we have learned much of animal life during the last few years and our respect for its attainments has been increased. It need not be said that Mr. Hudson is as delightful as he always is. His unrivaled powers as a narrator were never better displayed.

ADVENTURES AMONG BIRDS. By W. H. Hudson. New York: E. P. Dutton & Co.; $4.

Police and Public.

The author, Lieutenant-Colonel Arthur Woods, was formerly police commissioner of New York City. He now writes a little volume intended to create a bridge of sympathy between the police and the public by explaining the duties of the policeman, the shortcomings of which he has been guilty, and the improvements that may be noted in his bearing and morale. He writes in a lively and entertaining way and with copious dialogue and incident. He certainly succeeds in showing that "the policeman's lot is not a happy one" and that he is often forced into positions that could be filled successfully only by an archangel.

Colonel Woods writes necessarily from the New York point of view, and his remarks have therefore a local and somewhat restricted bearing. He says that a proper understanding between police and public "would make intolerable any action on their part (the police) that would tend to commit them more to the service of one part of the community than another." We do not know quite what measures he would recommend to this end, but it is certain that the police are almost invariably partisans in labor troubles and that they will continue to show the same vice so long as present methods of selection and control are perpetuated. The public, of course, is to blame, and it is to be feared that even the police strike in Boston has had small effect in awakening other municipalities to the dangers of a divided authority in police control.

THE POLICEMAN AND THE PUBLIC. By Lieutenant-Colonel Arthur Woods, A. M. New York: Yale University Press; $1.35.

Briefer Reviews.

"Bobbins of Belgium," by Charlotte Kellogg (Funk & Wagnalls Company), contains a full account of the lace-making industry of Belgium, written in a popular way and with numerous practical illustrations.

"Writing Through Reading," by Robert M. Gay, professor of English, Simmons College, Boston, is described as "a suggestive method of writing English with directions and exercises." It is published by the Atlantic Monthly Press.

E. P. Dutton & Co. have published "Foster's Auction Made Easy," by R. F. Foster. It is described as "intended more especially for the beginner, although the more advanced player will also find many useful hints for improving his game." The price is $1.60.

Our commercial English leaves much to be desired, grammatically and in every other way. For this reason there should be a welcome for a little book just published by Harper & Brothers. It is entitled "Handbook of Business English," by George Burton Hotchkiss, M. A., and Edward Jones Kilduff, M. A., and it seems to be in every way satisfactory.

Democracy and Ideals.

The war has brought Americans into close contact with Europeans, and upon both sides a certain amount of wonder has been aroused by habits of thought and action that are unfamiliar. There has been a kindly conflict of ideals, and we may suppose that this will not be without more or less permanent and modifying results upon both sides of the Atlantic.

This may be said to be the subject of Professor John Erskine's new book on "Democracy and Ideals." He asks what weaknesses have been disclosed by our recent national experience and how they may be remedied. In other words, what shall we now do with our democracy in the light of current events? And incidentally how can we overcome our national fault of detachment from the past.

The trouble is that we have so many pasts. The immigrant, and we are most of us immigrants, can hardly be expected to "enthruse" over national events in which neither he nor his forefathers bore a part, and while his memory is filled with other national and European events in which he and his forefathers did bear a part. If he knows anything of American historical events it is because he learned of them at school, but they can hardly be a part of himself as they are to the old-time American. But now there has been a national event, the war, in which all participated. We have seen the birth of an universal American tradition.

There are other differences of ideals between America and Europe and they should be recognized. The Frenchman, for example, seems to lack delicacy in matters of what the author calls physical hygiene. But his mental delicacy far exceeds ours. He does not slap his new acquaintance on the back nor call him by his first name, nor admit him readily to the intimacy of his home. If we wonder at the Frenchman's lack of delicacy in one respect he wonders equally at ours in another.

The war has painfully disclosed the large number of Americans who are illiterate, who can not speak English, who have had no sort of training for a career. These are evils that must be recognized and remedied. But the author does not preach. Never were admonitions given in so kindly a tone or with more sympathy.

Particularly good is the author's reply to certain German critics who have defended their own cruelties by a citation of American cruelties. It is true, says Professor Erskine, that negroes are sometimes burned in America, but Americans are ashamed of their wrong-doing, whereas the German does wrong and is not ashamed of it, nor even aware of it. We learned that a whole nation had no sense of honor, that it deplored its crimes, not because they were crimes, but because they were errors.

The Vanished Friend.

This is one of the now almost innumerable books intended to establish the fact of communication with the dead. It is described as "evidence, theoretical and practical, of the survival of human identity after death." But we fail to find the evidence. It is true that there are communications with the conscious minds of the sitters, but we can not find anything more than unsustained assertion that these communications are from the dead. And we are strongly inclined to believe that they have no such source in view of what we now know of the subconsciousness and the hitherto unsuspected range of those outlying fields of consciousness of which the purport and the meaning are still matters of conjecture. It is not often that a foreword is found to throw doubt on the conclusions of the author, but Margaret Deland, who supplies the foreword to Mr. Thibault's book, says of it that it must be considered uneventual. She remarks that "M. Thibault's experiments in telekinesis may be credited to the operation of some unconscious incarnate mind; the mental phenomena he has observed may be explained by saying that the information he states he has received from invisible intelligences has reached him telepathically from the living; or else, having been known to the dead, it exists in the cosmic mind, and has been apprehended by the medium." The part of wisdom seems to be to accept the authenticated facts and to waive the theories to one side, and particularly the theories that spring from an uncritical credulity. And it is hard to place M. Thibault's theories in any other category.

Gossip of Books and Authors.

The Scribners promise a timely new book in the announcement that they will shortly bring out "Dalmatia and the Yugoslav Movement," by the well-known Yugoslav diplomatist, Count Louis Voinovitch. The book is said to throw much light on the real nature and development of the peoples in this much-discussed corner of Europe.

King Victor Emanuel of Italy has awarded to E. Alexander Powell, author of "Italy at War," "New Frontiers of Freedom," etc., the order of the Crown of Italy. Mr. Powell was the first of the war writers properly to interpret the importance of Italy's part in the war and to reveal the military efforts of that nation, which the general public had been inclined to underrate.

Otto H. Kahn, author of "Our Economic and Other Problems," is one of the world's best-known financiers, a member of the famous private banking firm of Kuhn, Loeb & Co. in New York. He is of German birth and parentage, but is one of the most conspicuously public-spirited Americans. He made a notable record in war work and publicly embraced the Allied cause from the beginning of the world war. France made him a Chevalier of the Legion of Honor for his services to the Allies. Italy and Belgium made him a commander of the order of the Crown of Italy and Belgium respectively. Mr. Kahn is chairman of the Metropolitan Opera, the French Theatre, and a leader in many other institutions of the musical and art world.

No man today is better qualified to talk on world policies and national affairs than David Jayne Hill, author of "American World Policies." He was Assistant Secretary of State under John Hay during the administrations of McKinley and Roosevelt, was minister to Switzerland and Holland, delegate to the great Hague Peace Conferences, and ambassador to Germany, which he left in 1911, when he saw it was impossible to prevent the Kaiser from bringing on the Great War.

Chinese Fruits.

Some of the Chinese fruits, cunningly coaxed and lovingly cherished through many centuries, are said by experts to be delicious. There is an orange grown in China that is reported to surpass in sweetness and delicacy any of the oranges to which the people of Europe or of America are accustomed; and it may be grown in places where the temperature falls 20 degrees below the freezing point. There is also a peach unlike anything to which the West is accustomed, and a winter muskmelon that will appeal irresistibly to the American palate. This melon is at its best in December and January. There are many other good things in China to which the United States will doubtless be introduced in time. Of some of the choice Chinese dishes, such as bird's nest soup and the like, there are better things in reserve. The fruits are described as surpassing those of any other country.

"LINGER LONGER LETTY."

The piece that is the vehicle for long-limbed Charlotte Greenwood is by Anna Nichols, and it is very plain that this writer knows all the Greenwood qualities so well that she shows them off to the best advantage in her creation of the character of Letty. Letty is the ugly duckling in the Larkin family, which has a plurality of pretty girl sisters who blithely annex all the young men on the horizon, and, as a matter of course, utterly extinguish Letty. Letty the invaluable spends all her time in the kitchen haking, brewing, and washing clothes.

There was a time in the history of womankind when the Marthas took their insignificance, and their shadowy corner, and their medicine, and never peeped. But that time is over. The era of unfairness is coming to an end. Since woman vigorous revolutes when man is unkind to her the insurrection is getting to be even more marked when her fellow-woman is unfair to her. So Letty, who has hitherto been the domestic drudge, calls in a hearty cultist, who plans her costumes with an eye to her peculiar style of beauty, and the kitchen is deserted.

Charlotte Greenwood, of course, at first wears rather a grotesque rig, cultivates the peeled-onion style of coiffure, and, referring to her lack of curvilinear dimensions, makes many discouraged references to her lack of natural projections, so to speak. Charlotte wears bloomers, aggressive, long-drawn-out bloomers, and rather suggests a member of the Scandinavian race as she whacks off a batch of biscuit, manipulates an electric iron, and humbly washes the domestic dish.

But you can't take your eyes off her a single minute. If you do you may be sorry, for she is apt to wave one leg over the top of a dresser, or accomplish a cat-like leap that lands her from the middle of one room to the middle of the next.

But it isn't only her muscular feats that hold our attention. This long-limbed siren has personality, an abounding sense of humor, spontaneity in conveying it, and a temperament that hubbles like champagne. She has, too, a warm, magnetic voice and a delightful way of vitalizing everything she says. There is the spring of youth and a resilient temperament expressed in her sparkling face and in everything she says, or does, or looks. In fact the girl is sui generis.

Well, take this long-legged, long-armed, double-jointed blonde geyser of fun, put her as the centre attraction in a piece that was written all around her, and you have a tremendous drawing-card; one that succeeded in filling the Curran to the doors.

The star has the support of a whole raft of good-looking satin-clad girls and young men of an age to match. Robert Higgins plays opposite to her, his rôle being also that of an ugly, or at least a disregarded duckling, a navy duckling, who finally captures the abstracted female gaze by becoming such a dandy in his civilian clothes as to outshine his military rival.

Mr. Higgins also has personality, although he rather over-stresses his assumed voice and manner, the which throws out Charlotte Greenwood's natural style into even stronger relief.

She is an intelligent thing, that Charlotte. She isn't just a double-jointer, but she expresses things naturally and vividly. When things go well with Letty, Charlotte's face is alive with fun and humor. When Letty is down and out her sparkle is quenched, and every feature droops.

The rest of the company is all right, but call for no special comment, being of that order of utilitarian stage material that they send here so often. For rarely indeed is it that we see, in musical comedy, a complete first-class cast.

However, the girls are pretty and prettily gowned, the comedy is continually lively and entertaining, there is enough music to please the lover of melody jingles—the music by Alfred Goodman—and the "Linger Longer Letty" number is pretty, yearning, and expressive.

They keep us waiting a long time before Charlotte Greenwood appears in her hearty harness, which is rich in color and telling in design. But somehow I prefer Charlotte's countenance in the kitchen rig. She looks younger, more innocent, more unworldly, and less materialistic.

Charlotte Greenwood is a great card, and no mistake. With all her other qualifications she is richly dowered indeed to be so spontaneously humorous.

"THE PRINCE OF PILSEN."

Evidently "The Prince of Pilsen" was received at the Columbia for the San Francisco engagement, for, although the very good company gave a very good performance of this most tuneful opera, it did not show the high polish that was a marked characteristic of "The Chocolate Soldier." The two personable young men were mysteriously stripped of their glamour, the dashing and gayly satirical Bernerli of "The Chocolate Soldier" having been transformed into a highly proper, conventional, and almost if not quite starched young naval lieutenant who might have come from the most rigorously respectable precincts of New England.

Ann Tasker and her alternate have disappeared, and Leslie Leigh, an engaging, clear-voiced, and sartorially smart young lady, having assumed the lead in their place. Lavinia Winn, the Mascha of "The Chocolate Soldier," was also in a prominent rôle, and Dorothy Elton, inexperienced, unpolished, a little deficient in a sense of rhythm, but sweetly pretty in a winningly natural, dark-haired, soft-eyed style, was also brought forward as the sweetheart of the young lieutenant.

Jefferson De Angelis was, of course, extremely funny as the Cincinnati brewer, with just the right degree of dialect, and depicting Hans Wagner's alcoholic exhilaration with the abandon tempered by the discretion of a comedian. Sam J. Burton of the Alcazar forces was horrified for the rôle of Artie, Earl of Shrimpton, and as this rôle fits his particular style and specialty he proved himself an acquisition. Detmar Poppin, the light-heeled one who was so very funny as the hurler captain in "The Chocolate Soldier," was equally light-heeled, but not so funny, as the head waiter. If he had had the material, however, he would have made good, as this actor has any quantity of "pep." Eva de Verna, although no singer, was the coquettishly smart maid to the life, and the chorus, both men and women, repeated the good impression already made.

There is an enjoyable atmosphere of ex-Europe in the comedy; that smiling, howling, hill-presenting Europe, loved of the tourist, that it will take time, much time, to bring back. The world's playground became a camp, and now is a workshop, and our billionnaires, millionaires, and hundred-thousand-dollaraires will have to put up with Florida, California, our sight-seeing trips, and the Canadian resorts. Will that Europe, now so starved, stripped, and denuded, ever come back in our time? Well, they'll make a mighty hard try at it, for there's lots of money in this tourist-ing business.

"The Prince of Pilsen" is crammed with a pleasure-seeking population, among whom are five Heidelberg students off for a lark. Led by the fine haritone of Edward Quinn they sang "Old Heidelberg," and were encored repeatedly. Yes, the war is over, and its angry animosities, with us, at least, are becoming modified. Hans Wagner's Germanisms, the young German prince from the real Pilsen, the Heidelberg students singing the song that would have been hooted from the stage two years ago; how odd it seems.

Mr. J. Humbird Duffey also charmed the ear with some of the familiar love lyrics that have become almost all classics. In fact the opera itself, in its light line, has become a classic, for Gustav Luders is a composer of superior attainments, much above the average in his line.

I note, by the way, that this very capable organization is killed for another piece, "The Firefly," in which Mahel Riegelman will appear for the first time on the musical-comedy stage. This is very distinctly a tremendous treat, and gives some idea of the very solid nature of the musical attainments of the company. Not the least of the dependable elements is the presence of our old friend Mr. Paul Steindorff, who is the leader of the orchestra; a position in which we have sat under him many a time and oft in old Tivoli days.

AT THE ALCAZAR.

There are new faces at the Alcazar this week, and the audiences are scanning the new leading lady and man from the seats of judgment and saying, "Will they pass?"

Inez Ragan, the successor to Belle Bennett, is not, on the whole, a very great deviation in appearance from her predecessor, being plump, white-skinned, blonde, and golden-haired. Miss Ragan has a good, carrying voice, and marked distinctness of enunciation. She also seems to be a tasteful and dainty dresser. Her personality is agreeable, and she assumes at will the slightly pensive air and tone of the romantic heroine with whom things are going at cross-purposes.

Mr. Dudley Ayres is a young man of attractive appearance, good features, and bristling coloring. He speaks well, walks well, and acts well in the lavishly diluted sentimentalities of "The Cinderella Man." But I do not consider that I know much about the histrionic capabilities of either of these players, as "The Cinderella Man" merely enshrines youth and good looks in sentimentally heguling attitudes. It makes no particular call on the acting ability, for it has no genuineness of sentiment.

For instance: Knowing human nature as well as we do, what are we to think of the common sense and judgment of the young lady of the twentieth century heging her father prettily to disinherit her so that the poor Mr. Cinderellaman writing poetry in his garret will propose to her. And "Why yes," said the family friend; that good old dramatic lay figure borrowed from the French who pets and indulges the heroine and automatically encircles her waist with his arm whenever they approach each other (although the French would never, never allow that). "Why, of course," says Mr. Family Friend to the indignant and incredulous millionaire father; "give the child her way, you old blowhard," or words to that effect. "Here she wants something precious that money won't buy, and you come interfering along, planning to leave the poor child your ugly old million dollars."

I confess to finding myself unable to breathe naturally in such a rarefied atmosphere. However, the child-like, confiding public sucks it down like sugar candy, and as "The Cinderella Man" is a pretty well-known play, this being a revival after former runs, we may feel sure that that wise guy, the author, Mr. Edward Childs Carpenter, has retained his honeyed sentimentalities for a good, solid figure.

Rather discouraging for the real, genuine article of play-writer, but what would you? The varying tastes of the public must be gratified. I see there are two merry comedies im-

"Doing the Job"

"The great thing to accomplish is the doing of the job, and the public will hold us responsible for having the job done. . . . We must do it efficiently, and then we are entitled to our rewards. If we don't do it, we ought gracefully to take what undoubtedly will result."

These words are taken from a paper read during the National Electric Light Convention held recently at Pasadena.

They were spoken by a man who understands thoroughly the rights and duties of public utilities.

They apply to all public utilities, including water companies, of course; and to all departments of public utilities, great and small.

They express a truth which we have adopted as our rule of conduct.

Our Service Department makes the practical application of that truth—translates it into action.

Giving its best thought, its best effort to the administration of your water supply, the Service Department is constantly striving, in the words of the speaker at Pasadena, to "do the job efficiently."

With the Service Department, that means giving satisfaction as well as water.

It means Useful Service.

How well the Service Department succeeds in giving Useful Service is for you to judge.

You have an opportunity to judge whenever you call upon the Service Department for assistance.

Don't hesitate to call upon it whenever you think that it can help you.

JOSEPHINE HART PHELPS.

FOYER AND BOX-OFFICE.

The Columbia Theatre.

Because of the popular deoand it has been decided to keep "The Prince of Pilsen" on the hoards at the Columbia Theatre for another week with Jefferson De Angelis in the rôle of Hans Wagner, supported by Leslie Leigh as Mrs. Madison Crocker and the full strength of the New Bostonians. The final week begins this Sunday.

As played by De Angelis, Hans Wagner is one of the funniest characters ever to step on the stage. Miss Leigh is ideal as the dashing widow and the other members of the New Bostonians show to excellent advantage.

J. Humbird Duffey has a splendid rôle for his talents in Tom Wagner, the young American naval lieutenant; Edward Quinn is imposing as the real Prince of Pilsen; Detmar Poppin keeps the audience in continual up- roars of merriment through the medium of his François; Lavinia Winn is delightful as Nellie; Dorothy Elton plays Edith nicely, and Sam Burton is excellent as the foppish Artie.

"The Prince of Pilsen" continues for the entire week, with matinées on Wednesday and Saturday and will be followed by "The Firefly," with Mahel Riegelman, the celebrated grand opera prima donna, in the principal rôle of Nina. Miss Riegelman has just joined the New Bostonians and will make her début in the rôle. Jefferson De Angelis will be seen as Jenkins, the droll confidential secretary.

The Curran Theatre.

The Curran Theatre offers the most attractive offering of the present season, Charlotte Greenwood. Sunday night will begin her second week in her latest and greatest musical comedy, "Linger Longer Letty." In the new fun-making vehicle the only Charlotte scored the same pronounced hit that she did in her former success, "So Long Letty."

Oliver Morosco is presenting the entire New York company and a big chorus of Broadway beauties, who embellish the musical numbers supplied by Alfred Goodman and Bernard Grossman.

Anna Nichols wrote the hook, and she has kept away from the common devices of musical comedy and has injected into it a new brand of humor with enough genuine laughs to supply a dozen ordinary musical comedies. Supporting Miss Greenwood is a typical Morosco cast of well-known musical-comedy artists and a large and youthful chorus. Prominent in the cast are Robert Higgins, Charles Morrison, George Sweet, Virginia Tavares, Olga Roller, and Curtyne Englar.

The Orpheum.

Four theatrical celebrities will hold forth at the Orpheum throughout all of next week, starting Sunday matinée. These are Louise Dresser, Jack Gardner, Elsa Ryan, and Clara Morton.

The former two are working together in an act which is described as a cycle of individual songs. Both are well known for the manner in which they have put over songs in productions and vaudeville, and both hail from principal rôles in musical productions which enjoyed a nation-wide reputation. Miss Dresser is a statuesque blonde of excellent appearance and personality. Gardner is one of the most likable chaps on the stage, it is said. He is declared to have given a good account of himself in "The Chocolate Soldier" and "Madame Sherry."

Elsa Ryan, in a neat skit entitled "Peg-for-Short," will demonstrate her skill in depiction of a dramatic rôle which has won her much favorable comment throughout her Orpheum tour.

Clara Morton, formerly one of "The Four Mortons," one of the widest known families of vaudeville, will return as a single in the same natural character which established her reputation when a member of the family act.

Other favored twins among the Orpheum's new-comers next week will be Harrison Greene and Katherine Parker in a minstrel afterpiece provided for them by James H. Morton, Palo and Palet, two thoroughly finished musicians, and the Novelty Clintons in an unusual leaping act. "Kiss Me," musical comedy, holds over. Topics of the day and weekly events complete the bill.

The Alcazar Theatre.

Its new leading players, Inez Ragan and Dudley Ayres, having scored brilliantly and decisively in "The Cinderella Man" this week, the Alcazar now has the strongest organization in years. Next Sunday's offering is "On the Hiring Line," George C. Tyler's recent hit. It is by Harvey O'Higgins and Harriet Ford, who are credited with one of the wittiest comedies of the past New York season. Mrs. Fessenden, ex-actress, does not like the country and drives the servants away, forcing her husband and step-daughter to do all the work. Fessenden swears he will get servants who will stick. He engages two private detectives, man and wife, to act as butler and cook. They stumble on a proposed elopement and a mysterious love letter, and the whole household, including several guests, are plunged into a whirlpool of comic cross purposes. There is a splendid cast, headed by Dudley Ayres as the distracted householder; Inez Ragan, the actress-stepmother; Jean Oliver and Ben Erway as the young elopers; Brady Kline a temperamental actor; Rafael Brunetto and Emily Pinter as a flirtatious couple; Al Cunningham and Anna McNaughton as the detective servants.

"Peg o' My Heart," the most phenomenally successful romantic comedy ever acted in America, will be given for one week commencing Sunday, July 18th. This is the beginning of a series of famous plays in rapid succession.

DUTCH CELEBRATE SAILING.

A distinguished committee has been formed in the Netherlands for the observance of the tercentenary of the sailing of the Pilgrim Fathers. It includes several ministers of state, an ex-premier, the chief burgomasters and the leading governors of provinces. The universities are well represented on it—especially that of Leyden, as is fitting—and the historians are well to the fore. Dr. Henry Van Dyke of Princeton and Dr. J. Rendel Harris of Manchester are members from America and England respectively, as are Viscount Bryce, the great exponent of American institutions in Europe, and Lord Reay, the Dutch statesman, who years ago was summoned to become heir to the MacKay estates in Great Britain.

The representative committee of management have already done much, having outlined the plan of their meetings for the celebrations and congress. The "congress" is the learned part of the festival and will be held chiefly in the Leyden University, where the scholarly side of Pilgrim history will be considered.

After two days in Leyden the congress will move to Amsterdam, where a truly regal reception awaits them. They will visit the State Picture Gallery and take part in religious services in the ancient Bagynkerk (the English Reformed Church), where the remnant of the Pilgrim community (those that remained on in Amsterdam in 1620) finally sought church membership.

On Thursday, September 2d, it is proposed that American members of the congress be carried by canal boats from Leyden to Delfshaven—or at least part of that way—along the exact route traversed on July 31, 1620, by the earliest group of Pilgrims that sought a home in New England. On arriving at Rotterdam (of which Delfshaven is now an integral part) the visitors will be taken by boat around the harbors, luncheon will be served on board, and afterward dinner. During the interval a service will be conducted in the venerable Dutch Church of Delfshaven and a popular concert of American and Dutch sacred music will be given in the Cathedral of St. Lawrence. This edifice, recently restored, is one of the most stately and impressive in the Netherlands.

It is replete with historic mementos, and as it seats some five thousand hearers one may judge what impression this function may make both on American and Dutch delegates. It will be the crowning event in this series. On the preceding Sundays devotional services have been arranged to be addressed by eminent American pastors in the ancient Scots Church of Rotterdam—the church of the exiled Covenanters banished by Charles II—and in the still more venerable English Reformed Church in the Bagynhof, Amsterdam. The latter is associated not only with Pilgrim history, but with the curious and heroic stories of the Reformed Church of America and the Reformed Church in the United States. It is expected that one of the events of the Amsterdam visit will be the unveiling of memorial windows.

No doubt also the plan to have a fitting memorial erected in memory of the Pilgrims at Delfshaven will be carried out. One can scarcely exaggerate what America, and, indeed, the world, owes to Holland. And that debt is due to Holland, not merely through the Pilgrims, but through the Dutch influence in New York and through the influence of the Reformed Church in the United States still further south. But the main subject of this sympathetic Dutch celebration will be the Pilgrims' heritage—and that is a marvelous one.

The Pilgrims loved liberty before they sought refuge in Holland, but in Holland they had their love of liberty immeasurably deepened and intensified. They learned tolerance (as the most tolerant nation then existing understood it), they learned representative government, freedom of press, personal care and concern for the poor and such practical concerns as the keeping of archives, the documenting of titles and deeds. And it must not be forgotten that the twelve years that the Pilgrims spent in the "Federation of States," now called Holland, taught them to analyze and think out the problem of states' rights and Federal government.

The English celebrations begin at the conclusion of the Dutch congress and last a week. They will be held in part at Southampton and Plymouth and in part at Scrooby, the cradle of the Pilgrim community. Thus the two series of meetings are closely coordinated.

The supervisor in charge of the Blackfeet agency at Browning, Montana, has issued a circular advertising for sale certain Indian lands. The list of the allottees shows that the years have not driven out all the picturesque Indian names. There are Chief All Over and Richard Calf Tail and Blanket Woman Don't Go Out among the old-fashioned kind. But what sort of a name is Everbody Looks at Marrow Bones? It sounds like a song. And Annie Rides at the Door might be the title of a poem. Lucy Iron Eater is no name for a gentle lady, but it is easier to write than Yellow Bird Takes Gun on Top or Strikes on Top Morning Eagle. Petrified Russell has a Puritan sound. Chipping too Deep Night Shoots is too deep for us.—New York Sun.

VANITY FAIR.

It is said that a certain gloom pervaded the atmosphere when the jewels of Gaby Deslys were sold by auction in a public gallery in Paris. Perhaps it was only the fancy of an impressionable correspondent, but the Parisians are a sentimental people, and the gulf between anything so personal as jewelry and a public auction room is wide and obvious. Every glittering trinket there must have had its history in emotion, in the joy of purchase or gift, in the ecstasy of possession. Every one must have been fragrant with romance and with a voiceless eloquence of hound and footlights. If only they could tell their stories, but perhaps it is as well that they can not. There is hardly an antique jewel in the world without its record of blood and crime as well as of love, hardly one without its guilt of greed and murder.

But what an astonishing mass of jewelry was owned by Gaby Deslys. One wonders where it all came from, but that is one of the things that we are never likely to be told. No matter how large her earnings as a dancer she could hardly have bought a half of it. The most wonderful thing there was a platinum collar carrying an enormous diamond and four splendid pearls. In the centre was a great black pearl weighing 140 grammes flanked by two white pearls nearly as large. It had been valued at 500,000 francs, but the auctioneer was unable to raise the bids above 402,000 francs, and it went to some unknown person who was supposed to be acting for a wealthy client. Doubtless we shall hear more about this resplendent collar, and it is fairly safe to assume that the news will come from somewhere in America.

Gaby Deslys was a lover of pearls and there was much curiosity to see her collection. A chain of 154 pearls was sold for 280,000 francs, and three pearl necklaces brought a total of 1,054,000 francs. A platinum net bag studded with diamonds and pearls was sold for 39,000 francs, which was said to be much less than its value. But the most curious of all the articles offered for sale was a belt made of American gold coins, including seven-teen twenty-dollar pieces. This brought 4100 francs, a curiously low price, seeing that the coins alone were worth more than that amount. Presumably the belt was the gift of some American admirer, and it may be that the donors themselves were in some cases among the hiders. It would be strange if it were not so, for who would wish to see his gift to a lady fall into strange hands and amid the prosaic associations of an auction room?

Gaby Deslys left nearly the whole of her fortune to the poor of her native town, Marseilles. Her name had frequently been linked with that of the ex-King of Portugal, and the supposed scandal will probably live until both are forgotten. But the story was a pure invention. Probably the king never once spoke to Gaby Deslys. Certainly he was never in love with her nor she with him.

St. Paul said that the glory of a woman is her hair, but, as Hosea Bigelow once sagely remarked, "They didn't know everything down in Judee." The apostle doubtless had his conservatism, and indeed it may be that he was protesting against the fashion of hobbling the hair. For who knows? There is nothing new under the sun, and feminine fashions subside and reappear with the regularity of the seasons.

There is no doubt that we are in for a cycle of short-haired women. Very nice they look, too, some of them, but unluckily the fashion is not confined to those whom it suits. Fashions rarely are.

"Girls past twenty," says a writer in the New York Times, will sometimes hesitate for weeks before allowing their crowning glory to be cut away. But when they have once crossed the Rubicon it has been observed that a change in demeanor at once follows. They become kittenish. Is it possible that the hair has an actual effect upon the disposition, or do these decidedly adult girls feel that they must "live up to" their rejuvenated looks? The latter alternative is probably the correct one.

It was the war that popularized the new fashion, says the Times writer. Welfare workers cut off their hair before going to France. It was hygienic, it was comfortable, it saved time in "fixing," and it lessened the labors of washing. Then came the influenza epidemic with its sequel of falling hair which could be remedied only by the drastic scissors. Such, at least, was the excuse, although no one ever suggested that influenza produced falling hair among men. It seems that the short-haired woman originated in Russia, and it may be observed that the long-haired man, who is even more of a horror, also abounds in that unlucky land. The revolutionary women of Russia were in the habit of wearing short hair as a disguise. A number of them came to New York many years ago and they were imitated by the art women of Greenwich village. So we owe to Russia both the short-haired woman and the Bolshevik. One is inclined to wonder to what further extent Russia will place us in her debt.

The short-haired woman has the decided advantage in sea bathing. She need not wear those appalling rubber caps which are hideous enough to justify divorce on the spot. And, by the way, it is surprising to notice how few women show to advantage when bathing. An English magistrate has just been advocating separate bathing beaches for men and women at the seaside resorts. He does not seem to be an uplifter or a purist. He hates his demand on public policy. Broken engagements, he says, and therefore a lowered marriage rate result from mixed bathing. Women do not show to advantage when they are in the water or after they leave it. A wet woman is usually uncharming to the eye. She is unattractive when covered by an adequate bathing dress. She is apt to be still more uncharming if the bathing dress is inadequate, as it usually is. When St. Paul said that a woman's glory is her hair he certainly did not refer to wet hair, which has nothing of the glorious about it. Quite the contrary. It is a shade more objectionable than the rubber cap. But the woman with short hair may wet it with impunity, since it can be dried in five minutes. None the less it seems to us that if we were a woman of the common or garden type we should think it the part of prudence to take our ocean bathing at some spot far removed from the vision of our male admirers. We should be cautious of disillusionment. We should seek to preserve the mystery, so to speak. At the present time the bathing beach constitutes a grave warning against matrimony.

No one (says the London Daily Telegraph) has a good word to say for modern dancing. Ecclesiastics, moralists, journalists, when graveled for lack of matter, fill up their time and space by denouncing its ugliness and impropriety. The phenomenon is not even modern. Addison made as much fuss over the fashions of his hallrooms as the early Victorians over the waltz or we over the tango and the fox trot. And probably, if all were known, there were Druids who said the most unpleasant things about the dancing round Stonehenge. But while oldish people from age to age indulge in the delights of disapproval of the young, the young go on dancing, and, as they fondly believe, are happy in their own sweet way. But it is not so. They do not dance as they like, but as they are told. Over them broods a congress of dancing masters. It has just ended its sittings at Paris, the centre of civilization, the home of congresses; it has made decisions which, we are assured, "will affect the daily lives of millions of human beings." And who shall contest the claim?

The English masters, it appears, found themselves unable to agree, even after demonstration, to the principles of the foreign schools, and we have to remain insular Terpsichorean Athanasiaes against the world. This is disheartening for true believers in the league of nations. If we can not dance internationally, what hope is there of agreement in minor things?

STORYETTES.

Grave and Gay, Epigrammatic and Otherwise.

A small storekeeper put up in his window not long ago an elaborate new blind. Quoth his neighbor: "Nice blind of yours, Isaac." "Yes," was the reply. "Who paid for it, Isaac?" "The customers paid." "What? You say the customers paid for it, Isaac?" "Yes. I put a leedle box on my counter and labeled it, 'For the Blind,' and they paid for it."

A college professor who was always ready for a joke was asked by a student one day if he would like a good recipe for catching rabbits. "Why, yes," replied the professor. "What is it?" "Well," said the student, "you crouch down behind a thick stone wall and make a noise like a turnip." "That may be," said the professor, with a twinkle in his eye, "but a better way than that would be for you to go and sit quietly in a bed of cabbage heads and look natural."

Mother was telling Cyril of some occurrence in the neighborhood in which a man had been cruel to his dog. "He ought to be arrested and fined," Cyril said hotly when the story was finished. "Mother, don't you think we ought to have him arrested?" Mother shook her head. "We'll just wait and let God punish him," she proposed. Cyril thought a little while. Then he came back to his parent. "Mother, why not wait after this when I'm naughty and let God punish me, too?" he asked.

A little girl walked into a confectionery, placed a nickel on the counter, and called for an ice-cream cone. "Ice-cream cones are 7 cents, little girl," the fizz clerk announced. "Well, then, gimme a soda pop." "Six cents." "Got any root beer?" "Yep; 6 cents, too." The little girl sighed disappointedly and started out, leaving her nickel on the counter. "Here, little girl, you're leaving your nickel," the clerk called to her. "Oh, that's all right," the child shouted back. "It's no good to me—it won't buy anything."

"Fare!" The passenger gave no heed. "Fare, please!" Still the passenger was oblivious. "By the ejaculatory term 'Fare!'" said the conductor, "I imply no reference to the state of the weather, the complexion of the admirable blonde you observe in the contiguous seat, nor even to the quality of the service vouchsafed by this philanthropic corporation. I merely allude, in a manner perhaps lacking in delicacy, but not in conciseness, to the monetary obligation set up by your presence in this car, and suggest that you liquidate." At this point the passenger emerged from his trance.

Augustine Birrell some time ago, while traveling in a third-class railway carriage in the north of England, sat down hurriedly next to a little girl in shawl and clogs. Happening to glance at her a moment or two afterward, he saw that she was regarding him with no great favor. It dawned upon him that he was sitting on her newspaper. "Here, my dear," said Mr. Birrell, pulling the paper from under him and handing it to her; "I'm sorry." The little girl did not look quite satisfied, but she said nothing till a few minutes later the train drew up at a station. "Please, sir," she then inquired weakly, "may I have my fried fish?" It was in the paper.

Recently while on an extended automobile tour a party of men came to grief through engine trouble and, after two hours' tinkering with the motor and several thousand suggestions, the owner of the car decided the trip at an end. His friends, with the promise to send a team of horses from the nearest farm, commenced their hike to the railroad station, eight miles distant. They had traversed less than a mile when they were startled to hear the welcome honk of an auto and beheld their friend with his car behind them. With a smile he said: "Jump in, fellows. She's all right now. I had a fellow fix it up. Smart man, too. He found the trouble in less than a minute, but wouldn't take a cent. I promised to send him a box of smokes and he gave me his card. Here it is." "No wonder he fixed it quickly. He ought to," exclaimed one of the party. "Why?" asked the owner with surprise. "He was only a farmer." "Well," answered the first, "he may be taking a little vacation, but he is the chief engineer of the V— Motor Company, the people who built your car."

"I wish to marry your daughter," said the young man to the girl's father. "Does she love you?" asked the father. "Yes, sir. And I love her." "Well, that, of course, is the first necessary condition, but there are a few more questions I must ask. Have you made any shopping tours with her lately?" "No, sir." "Ever been in a department store and asked the price of women's suits and hats?" "No, sir." "Know anything at all about the cost of provisions?" "Only that which I have learned from the talk of others." "Well, young man, my advice to you is to make a trip of investigation. I don't know what your present income is, but after you've learned for yourself just what those clothes she wears are costing me, if you come back and say that you can support her in the style to which she has been accustomed lately, I'll give my consent."

A neighborhood story down Lisbon way has to do with a father who, one evening when his three small daughters were having too much fun jumping about and playing in their bed, went to the bottom of the stairs and threatened to spank them if they didn't become quiet. The girls remained quiet for a few minutes, then the fun broke out again. After this performance had been repeated several times the father went upstairs to carry out his promise. Without taking the trouble to light a lamp the father administered three spankings and went back downstairs. Next morning the eldest of the girls complained bitterly. "I don't see why you spanked me twice," she said. "I didn't," the father replied. "You surely did." "How could that happen?" "After you spanked me the first time Ethel flopped under the bed and came in at the front and you missed her altogether."

THE MERRY MUSE.

The Decision.

Maude has asked me to the mountains,
Grace has asked me to the sea,
And I know that both these places
Are as lovely as can be.
Maude says: "Don't bring many dresses!
No one fusses much up here!"
Um! I'm very good at guesses—
Not a man up there this year!

Grace says in her hurried letter:
"Not much time to write, you know.
Bring your gowns, the best, and better—
Such a place to make a show!"
Yes, I'm very good at guessing—
Maude has had a useless chase!
Think I'll wire her—time is pressing!
I must pack and rush to Grace!

A Ballade of Happiness

On happiness I sometimes muse,
And definitions dim recall;
I ponder on the varied views
Concerning that which holds in thrall
The short, the tall, the great, the small,
And while I query, while I guess,
Of this I have no doubt at all—
Keen is the golfer's happiness!
If mountain-climbing one pursues,
I wonder if it does not pall
With muscles sore and wearied thews
When night descends the mountain wall.
The horseman rides unto a fall;
What do his vivid words express?
Of this I have no doubt at all;
Keen is the golfer's happiness!
And those that o'er the waters cruise,
Should their craft be yacht or yawl,
Do they with ardor still enthuse
When blind and bitter blows the squall?
And is there not some drop of gall
For those who fish, and catch no "mess"?
Of this I have no doubt at all;
Keen is the golfer's happiness!

ENVOI.

O ye who smite the nimble ball,
Whatever may be your success,
Of this I have no doubt at all,
Keen is the golfer's happiness!

—Clinton Scollard in Life.

Is Fame Becoming Extinct?

A ballplayer of national prominence was hailed into court not long ago in connection with some misdemeanor. One can picture this darling of the public approaching the bar of justice—self-possessed, tolerant, and, perhaps, slightly amused. What, then, was his shock to find that the judge had never heard of him! The blow to his pride must have been far greater than the humiliation of his original arrest.

Yet this incident is only a sign of the times. With blinking eyes I have watched the world for the past few years and asked myself whether fame has ceased to be the reward of achievement or distinction. We have close at hand a really startling proof that it has.

It would be ridiculous even to assume that any reader of these lines has not been familiar from infancy—or from the event—with the names and achievements of Grant, Lee, Sherman, Sheridan, McClellan, Jackson, Meade, Hooker, Custer, and probably Longstreet and Beauregard, leaders in a war fought nearly sixty years ago. To the public of 1867 these names were certainly as vivid as they are to-day, yet how many readers can name a single American general who commanded any one of the huge separate armies into which our troops in France were divided? Who led the American forces at Saint-Mihiel? At Belleau Wood? At the Argonne? We all know that General Butler occupied New Orleans. Who occupied Germany?

Instinctively most of us would explain this phenomenon by some vague reference to "modern trench warfare," but the present-day anonymity of military heroes can be strangely duplicated in every one of those lines of prowess in which great fame has always been the peculiar reward.—Philip Curtiss in Harper's Magazine.

THE MASTER SPIRIT

"All works of taste must bear a price in proportion to the skill, time, expense, and risk attending their manufacture. Those things called dear are, when justly estimated, the cheapest; they are attended with much less profit to the artist than those which everybody calls cheap."

CURRENT VERSE.

Night Is the Time.

Night is the time! Look out and see;
Out of your window is mystery.

Lean far out, and leaning far,
Look down at the Earth and up at a star.

There is no earth, for in between Sways a shadow deep and green;

And this makes all the odder still
The bark of a dog on a neighboring hill;

The sound of footsteps coming near;
The talk of two lovers, soft and clear:

Some one whistles; some one calls;
Somehow utter silence falls:

Until, far off, a voice once more,
And unseen laughter passes your door.

That is the lovely thing about night,
You see without hearing, and hear without sight.

For if you turn your head to the sky,
Quite unheard the crowd goes by:

Never a sound from the rustling wind
And close warm mystery leaves your mind;

Quiet and far and very bright,
The unheard star fills all the night.

The Flyers.

We are the children of Science that mated with Vision,

Sons of a song that was wedded to furnace and wheel;

We are the riders of vapor and vastness Elysian—
Oceans impalpable dying in light at our keel;
We are the stranglers of storms and the wild playfellows

Of dusk that obscures and empurples, of dawn that yellows

The paths of Icarus over an earth engirdled
With rail of iron and rope of copper and steel!

We are the bearers of thunder to sector and city,
We are the sowers of death from the heights of the world,

Flinging our missiles of flame on the thousands
we pity,

Watching the harvest that leaps to the seed we have hurled;

We are the stalkers of prey for the hard-lipped
slayers,

We are the makers of sorrow for mourners and prayers,

Makers of bate for the fury and glory of battle Till slaying is slain and the flags of the slayers are furled.

We are the merchants of morrows whose caravels marry

Lima with London, and Boston with Omsk or Bombay,

Carry cargoes or men as the cables taht carry
Thought on a flutter of sound in a flutter of day;

We are the sellers of speed and the strong-souled buyers

Of time that the millions mourn and a world desires—

The gem men lust for, the thief that ruins and plunders,

The heast we hunt through the heavens and find and slay.

We are the bearers of freedom to millions be-sotted,

Men that have moiled in the mill of the office or trade,

Losing their souls in the grind of the labor allotted,

Slaves by surrender to habit, the starved and dismayed;

We are the masters that bind to a new indenture,
Waking the soul with imperial call of adventure

In cloud and cold and infinite isolation—
The lure, the challenge, the quest, and the high crusade!

Ye that are cheated of life by the toil that sustains you,

Ye that have wasted your days for the want of a goal,

Ye that have need of a sword for the sin that profanes you,

Ye that are avid of life to the least of its whole—
Come to the gates of the sky and the great-sailed galleys,

Seek ye the wine of speed in the cloud-walled alleys,

Riding the road of gods till the paths ye follow Shall wake the god that sleeps in the dust of your soul! —Frank Ernest Hill, in the Nation.

Transmitting Power.

The question of transmitting power long distances by means of gas made in the coalfields is raised by the engineering supplement of a British paper. One of the objects sought in erecting the proposed capital power stations in England and distributing electricity from them is to save the cost of conveying coal to individual factories. It is possible that the same advantage would be realized by transmitting gas instead of electricity. It is suggested further that the gas now made in a multiplicity of gas works scattered all over the country could be generated on modern lines in large works on the coalfields. The writer calculates that the money spent on the carriage of one year's coal by one of the London gas undertakings would alone suffice to pay for a main large enough to bring from Yorkshire all the gas it makes in the year.

THE ALLEGED HUMORISTS.

Housewife—If you love work, why don't you find it? Tramp (sadly)—Alas, lady, love is blind.—Herald.

"Have you ever thought of retiring from politics?" "Yes," replied Senator Sorghum; "but always with a shudder."—Washington Star.

"Hear about Bill Bottlenose? He's got a case of lumbago at his house." "I guess I'd better run over and help him drink it up."—Hame Sector.

Chauffeur—Cup of coffee, doughnuts, and some griddle cakes. Waitress—Cylinder oil, couple o' non-skids, and an order of blow-out patches.—Manitar.

Mary—They say that very wise people are awfully homely. Marty (very ardently)—Mary, you're the most beautiful girl in the world.—Carnell Widow.

Crimsanbeak—I understand that prohibition worker is going away for a change. Yeast—Really? Where is he going? Crimsanbeak—To Havana.—Yonkers Statesman.

"He is quite an artist, isn't he?" asked Smith. "Yes," replied Jones. "He painted an apple last week, and the critics all agreed that it was rotten."—Cincinnati Enquirer.

"Do you suppose there ever was a human being who didn't talk about his neighbors?" asked the cynical man. "Sure," said the genial citizen. "Name him." "Robinson Crusoe."—Birmingham Age-Herald.

"Does your wife believe what the ouija board says?" "Yes," replied Mr. Meekton. "And she's right. If my wife puts her hand on a ouija board it's going to say what she believes, or nothing."—Detroit Free Press.

Redd—That fellow Block's got a mighty good memory. Greene—How do you know? Redd—Because he borrowed $5 from me over a year ago, and he remembers it so well that he's never asked me for a loan since.—Taleado Blade.

Mr. Yaunghusband—If you will give me the oil, my dear, I will oil the casters of this chair so that they won't creak. Mrs. Young-husband—Oh, Harry, darling, we haven't a drop of castor oil in the house.—Detroit Free Press.

"Mr. Grahcoin rather belittles the value of a college education." "That's because he can't figure out how the sum total of Jack Grahcoin's achievements for the rest of his life will be worth the amount of money it is taking to get him through his sophomore year."—Birmingham Age-Herald.

"Ella's new photo must be a jolly good likeness." "Why?" "She's had it two days, and hasn't shown it to any one."—Edinburgh Scotsman.

"Well, do you find golf all you expected?" "All and more, sir," replied Mr. Dubwaite, who recently took up the game. "Yes?" "I used to think I had a pretty good flow of lurid language when I was changing an automobile tire or mending a puncture, but confronted by the necessities of golf, I'm as dumb as an oyster."—Birmingham Age-Herald.

Birds of Different Feather.

Regarded as a protest against vital or whimsically-imagined derelictions of the standard political organizations, the third party movement is not irrational. Regarded as a practical adventure in politics, it is an absurdity. No political movement ever got into effective and sustained existence upon a basis of negation and minus the inspiration of constructive purpose. A party made up of dissimilar, unsympathetic, and incongruous elements is in truth no party at all. At its best it can be nothing better than a temporary coalition of individuals or groups lacking the moral cement of a common aim and a common enthusiasm, subject to a thousand diverging forces and destined speedily to relapse into antagonistic factions. The first essential of political coöperation is coöperation of mind and purpose. To work together men must measurably at least think alike; and above all they must be imbued with the coöperative spirit.

The half-dozen or more groups now seeking at Chicago to unify themselves have in truth nothing in common. On the other hand they are representative of individual, of class, and of sentimental interests having no relationship to each other—tending, in truth, to pull apart rather than pull together. Can there be any mind so fatuous as to believe for a moment that Mr. Hearst, Mr. Pinchot, Mr. La Follette, and the half-score other chronic individualists now in conference at Chicago can strike and maintain a common gait toward a common objective? They will no sooner get their party machinery organized than their differences, with their rivalries for leadership, will smash it into its original elements. There can be no combination of men and groups so fundamentally divergent, each led by men so personally vain or vindictive, or both, as those who represent chronic bias and chronic discontent, the inspirations of vanity, with the various fads of nihilism, socialism, the single-tax theory, labor radicalism, and the spirit of negation.

It is conceivable that this movement may for the moment patch up a project, call it by a party name, and endow it with the outward marks of vitality, but it will be foredoomed from the start, and it can hardly be said that that which is destined to collapse can have any real existence.

The movement, if it shall actually get upon its feet, may stagger about for a brief time, but its only practical effect will be to relieve the standard parties of pestiferous irreconcilables, always a nuisance and commonly a menace. It is, perhaps, just as well all round that the faddists, the kickers, the congenital and chronic cranks should get themselves out from the old parties and even for a little while flock together. Birds of different feathers, they will speedily flock separately.

Mr. David Lawrence, the well-known correspondent—an habitual guesser who usually guesses wrong—ventures to prophesy that the "third party" will draw more votes from Harding than from Cox. It may be so, but we fail to discover a supporting reason for this judgment, and are led to conclude that the wish inspires the thought. Not in many years has the Republican party had anything like consistent support—anything, in fact, excepting criticism, protest, and obstruction—from the chronic malcontents. The party will be better off in every way if the individuals and the groups that have fraudulently assumed affiliation with it shall definitely break away and gang their own courses. Similarly with the Democratic party. It has gained nothing from such coöperation as it has had from protesting groups of malcontents and faddists. Its most serious mistakes of policy—its diverges from its traditions—have been made in futile effort to hold to party allegiance factions that know not the name of good faith and that have repaid concession with contempt and treason.

Politics in Flux.

In no presidential campaign of recent times have there been so many conditions of a sort that may be termed fluid. First, and possibly most important, is the increase in the electorate involved in extension of suffrage to women. Here we have a condition incalculable by any standard of precedent either as to the number of new voters or as to the tendencies of their action in politics. Of theories there are many, to be sure, but only time and events can give any approach to assurance of how the "woman vote" will affect the coming election.

The league of nations project gives to the present campaign another unknown quantity. What proportion of the voters of the country are for the Wilson league without reservations, for a league with some reservations, for a league with other reservations, or for no league at all—these are points wholly speculative in character. There are, to be sure, those who tell the country in phrases of assumed authority what the American people want, how they will vote, etc. The truth, none the less, is that nobody really knows.

In the issue of prohibition we have another unknown quantity. To what extent has sentiment in respect of prohibition become crystallized as a fixed and paramount motive of political action? Nobody knows more than that there is a radical element, presumably a minority, that will subordinate all other issues and motives to an enthusiasm for the "dry" cause. That the elements sentimentally "wet" or moderately "moist" have as yet attained a degree of resentment sufficient to control their votes is uncertain. The radical "drys," as yet questionable in point of numbers, will naturally vote for Harding, who, though no radical, is recorded as having given his vote in the Senate for the Volstead Act, and who therefore comes nearer to affiliation with the "dry" element than Cox, who, if not an out-and-out "wet," has a "moist" record, and who owes his nomination to elements distinctly affiliated with the liquor traffic, not only in its moderate and sentimental, but in its commercial phases.

There is uncertainty, too, about the labor element. That it has measurably abandoned allegiance to old party standards is obvious, likewise that it has largely become imbued with a class sense. Will its favor be given to the relatively conservative Harding, more dry than moist, or to the relatively radical Cox, more moist than dry? Political speculation tends to the judgment that the balance of favor will rest with the latter alternative. But nobody really knows.

The nomination of Cox by forces under the direction of the Brennan-Taggart-Murphy combine—definitely "practical" in its political inspirations and motives—would seem likely in the natural order of things to alienate the intellectual, idealistic, and otherwise sentimental elements that up to now have stood in solid support of the Wilsonian vagaries. How will the college professors, the schoolteachers, the fire-eyed uplifters, be disposed to political action in a situation which presents the alternatives of Harding, an old-line Republican frankly proposing to bring the government back to its constitutional basis, and Cox, rather more than less representative of sinister politics and an open repudiator of Wilsonianism?

Then there is the new "third party" now in process of organization. In what ratio will it draw votes from the candidates of the standard parties? Probably, if we accept the estimates of certain calculators, in approximately equal numbers. But again nobody really knows.

Very much will depend upon the terms in which Messrs. Harding and Cox shall declare their acceptances and urge their candidacies. For be it remembered that in their formal declarations of principles and policies both conventions have so fumbled, juggled, and evaded the issues as to have left it to the candidates to make their own platforms. Not the formal platforms, but the party names, plus the backgrounds of the candidates with what they shall say between now and November, will become the real platforms.

Of one thing we may be certain, namely, that there is general weariness in the country of methods of administration imposed during the past seven years in the name and by the authority of the Democratic party. In positive degree there is general weariness of Democracy as it has been interpreted and enforced by the Wilson régime. A sufficient demonstration of this fact is supplied in the final overthrow of Administration influence by a convention that up to the point of definite action was dominated by Administration agents.

San Francisco Invites the Republicans.

The movement to bring the Republican National Convention of 1924 to San Francisco is well in advance of the event. It comes too soon to accomplish anything more than registration of San Francisco's wish in the matter; and in that respect it may not be regarded as untimely. In view of our recent success with the Democratic Convention the project becomes a practicable one, although there will be many considerations favoring a more central location to be overcome by those who shall speak in behalf of San Francisco. The disadvantages of cost and of time are of course serious, but the advantage of climate is very great and will have weight with all who have suffered the stress of summer conventions at Chicago and other Mid-Western cities. Unquestionably San Francisco highly commended itself by the entertainment it gave its recent visitors. Hotel room was found sufficient to the comfort of all comers. There was nothing in the way of extortion. The policing arrangements of the convention hall were the best ever. Telegraphic facilities, to the surprise of everybody, were found adequate. These considerations will make largely in support of future invitations to national political gatherings.

Editorial Correspondence.

For long years I have joined in the more or less amiable "flinging" at Chicago and all its ways to which San Franciscans are addicted. There are many reasons why we have not liked Chicago. Something of jealousy there may be, due to a lively competition between the two communities in the commodity of brag. Neither is precisely modest and each has, perhaps unconsciously, found motives of irritation in the vociferous self-satisfaction of the other. Something of resentment on our part there may have been all these years on the score of Chicago's amazing material fortunes, undeniably more "stupendous" than our own, as illustrated in comparison of census reports, of transportation exchanges, of the statistics of hog-killings, and other indicia of material significance.

Those of us who go often to the East have resented the enforced change of trains with the incidental stop-over in a city that presents few attractions to the traveler whose main purpose is to get on East, and who interprets the interruption of his journey as a requirement wholly in the interest of Chicago's pie-counters. Having neither reason nor wish to spend time in Chicago, we have naturally hated the city whose business policy enforced by various forms of hold-up has made stopping over between trains a fixed requirement. It is not so much the small sums in the form of taxicab fares, restaurant rates, and other petty charges that we have from time out of mind had to yield in tribute to Chicago as spiritual resentment against having to yield tribute at all.

The prodigious energies and the amazing materiality of Chicago—very considerably, let it be confessed, in advance of our own—have given us our cue. It has pleased us to regard Chicago as a cormorant—not merely as a cormorant, but as a vulgar cormorant. We have loved to gibe at Chicago as a gross materialist; and under comparison of certain superficial conditions of climate, irritating bustle, coal smoke, mosquitoes, thunder and lightning, etc., we have dwelt both viciously and lovingly—therein illustrating how incongruities may be made to congrue—upon our own better fortune as marked in more salubrious airs, more or less perpetual sunshine, fruits, flowers, and other joyfulnesses of our situation and clime.

I come now, if not to repudiation of long-cherished sentiments and long-sustained resentments, to open confession that there may be found at Chicago certain conditions, influences, and with due hesitation I may add examples, worthy the attention even of San Francisco. This altered state of mind comes, as do most altered states of mind, through personal experience. Somebody with a middling tight grip upon the philosophies inherent in men and things has said that we like that which we know; at least it may be declared as a fairly sound principle that we cease to dislike that which we have been brought to understand. My newer views of Chicago have their inspiration very largely in hospitalities in connection with a week's sojourn there during the period of the national convention last month. Chicago as seen in a state of violent commotion and of crowded hotels attendant upon great popular gatherings—and Chicago is always having conventions—is one thing. Chicago as seen from the vantage of guestship in a charming house with every condition contributing to comfort and for unhurried observation of things beyond view of the traveler soiled and dejected from one railroad ride and in haste to get on with another, and with the knowledge that it is two thousand miles in one direction and a thousand in the other to a bath and fresh linen, is quite another thing. Let me confess that one week of the best side of Chicago has essentially modified the impressions of a hundred more or less stop-overs, ranging in time from the period required by a Parmelee cab to make jolting passage from the Northwestern station to Adams Street, to half a dozen weary hours spent dawdling in hotel corridors or in killing time on the lake front where never a bench may be found.

Here let me interject a lesson learned some thirty years ago in a brief but privileged intimacy with a great man of that day, none other than the late James Anthony Froude. I had set forth to Mr. Froude in conversations running through the better part of a week the things which to a then youthful mind appeared to import the glories and dignities of our Pacific Coast country. He had listened with what I took for interest, but what I now know to have been merely patience and toleration. At the end of my tale he remarked in the rich brogue whose best exponent in San Francisco is my friend Gavin McNab, "Me young freend—me veery young freend—ye hove told me much that I moy concede to possess o certain incidental value. Mind ye I soy incidental. But let me give ye a word of truth. I core something, but not much, for yeer statistics of corn, potatoes, cured plums, and growth of yeer peoples. Allow me to soy to ye that all yeer clearings of forests, all yeer incomings of men and weemen, all yeer multiplication of towns and commodities, come to nothing—nothing—unless with these odvancements ye have with them the groce of intellectual and moral progress." What in the raw innocence of youth I failed to take in its full significance, I have in such wisdom as maturer years have given me taken to heart as a lesson in essential morals and, in larger view, as a measure of real as distinct from false values.

In the course of a leisurely week in Chicago—leisurely in spite of the convention hubbub, thanks to provident and gracious hosts—I kept in mind Mr. Froude's standard of appraisement. I shied at the Board of Trade. I sought no statistics of railroads, of lake tonnage, of manufactures, of wholesale or retail trade. I even had the fortitude to decline repeated and pressing suggestions of visitation to the stock yards. I took for granted the very obvious truth that Chicago is a veritable mine of human energy and that her accomplishments in the ways of augmented population and in general "of multiplication of commodities" was everything that the most windy of enthusiasts ventures to picture. My observation and inquiries were centered upon things that Chicago has done and is doing in the way of developing and sustaining civilization. There was both entertainment and charm in the study, and happily it did not call for much delving in obscurities or mysteries. Evidences of "intellectual and moral progress" are plenty enough in Chicago if one will only take a little time and a little pains to look for them.

Let it be remembered that within the memory of men still living the site of Chicago was little better than a swamp, stagnant and miasmatic, infected with millions of insects that breed in shallows. All this is of the past. The physical foundations of the city have been made solid; the infested waters with the wastages that human occupation yields have been led into innocuous channels by an engineering courage and invention that have given an inspiring example with many helpful devices to the world. That which a few decades back was a pestilent breeding ground has become in its better districts a really beautiful city.

Let nobody smile when I declare that there are quarters of Chicago which distinctly recall something of the atmosphere and grace of Paris. Not even the famed Champs-Élysées may outrival in sheer beauty the long stretch of lake front extending northward from the site of old Fort Dearborn, flanked on the western side by sumptuous domestic establishments and rich between traffic-track and the beach with greenery of lawn and foliage. I know not where may be found avenues better furnished with all that makes for elegance and repose than those paralleling Lincoln Park on the west; and can anybody point to anything anywhere in the way of artificially developed beauty comparable with Lincoln Park itself, rich in cultivation and glorified by art, with the beautiful St. Gaudens Lincoln as its masterpiece? And Lincoln Park is only one of many, one leading to another by a series of boulevards whose animation, at least in the summer season, makes appeal both to the eye and to the spirit. Lacking Chicago is plainly in the charm of varied elevations, but in compensation of this deficiency there have been developed conditions hardly matched in any other American city. It is not, I think, generally known that some dozen or more years ago an association of beauty lovers took upon themselves the making of a general plan looking to ultimate harmonies upon ideal conceptions. Mr. Burnham, whose genius was the inspiration of our own Civic Centre, was brought to this task. It will take decades to work out plans that have been elaborately formulated. But something has already been done, and when with progress of years the dream shall become reality the City by the Lake will rank below none other on this round globe. Much may be said for the spirit of a generation which has thus made generous sacrifice for generations to come.

Even the hurried and the worried traveler can not fail to have noted the great structure on the lake front dedicated to the higher forms of art. Taste and liberality have already richly endowed it, as they have likewise endowed the greater Field Museum in another quarter of the city. It is, I fancy, not generally known that in this beautiful building there is maintained a school of art under the inspiration and instruction of world-famous masters and that this school is attended by students from in and about Chicago and its neighboring states more than double in number any other similar foundation in this country. To be sure, not every dabbler with palette and brush becomes a Rafael. Not every ambitious draftsman becomes a Sir Christopher Wren or a Richardson; but who may venture to limit the inspirations of this great school as they are carried year by year by returned students to every city and village in the widespread Middle West? Smile as you may at the suggestion of artistic inspirations as related to Wisconsin or Kansas—none the less their reflections may already be discerned in developments noble or humble to be found from Oshkosh to Emporia. I may cite as specially meritorious that interesting gallery of art at Milwaukee which bears the name of its founder—Lathan if my memory serves.

Assuredly it will come surprisingly to those who think of Chicago only as a stupendous agglomeration of materialities to know that nowhere else on the American continent is there such enthusiasm in the cause—if I may so style it—of classical literature. From no other source proceed such spreading influences of serious study. Few, I fancy, know that a Shakespearean Society in Chicago maintains and has for years maintained an active propaganda of Shakespearean interpretation energetically carried out by itinerant professional readers through wide circuits in cities and towns from the Texas border to and even beyond the Canadian line. I was told that Chicago is the home port, so to speak, of a race of literary voyagers who go from town to town—and find audiences, too—giving readings from all that is noblest in literature from Homer to Mark Twain.

Chicago has been the leader in a movement that the country has been slow to recognize as essential under the newer order of things to the vitality and spirit of the race. Few, perhaps, have been led to consider that conditions are vastly changed since the period of a generation ago when anywhere in America "all out of doors" was a children's gymnasium. In our own part of the world there still remains a fairly spacious out of doors with its facilities for physical development of childhood. But in many parts of the country, more particularly the manufacturing centres, children must play in the streets at hazard of life or limb or not play at all. Who has not noted the pale skin, the hollow eye, the narrow chest, the retarded vitality of town-bred children? Chicago, with foresight and generosity, has led off in the creation of playgrounds to the end of sustaining the physical stamina with the moral qualities depending upon it of the rising generation. That San Francisco has made a start in this highly humanitarian enterprise—even more notably our neighboring city Oakland, thanks to the enthusiasm of Miss Ethel Moore—is due primarily to the example of Chicago. To her honorable distinction let this fact be recorded and remembered.

The highest classical authority has celebrated the social value of music. Personally I do not concede that much that claims character as music is pure uplift. Very early in life I became imbued with the idea that music is not so much a thing of mathematical calculation and of harmonies conceivable only by the esoteric few—and the fashionable many—as that once defined as concord of sweet sounds. But putting the point of dispute to one side, there must be conceded to Chicago a definite leadership established long ago by Theodore Thomas, and since generously sustained, in an elevated form of musical art. In the language of old Gorgan Graham, Chicago is the headquarters—"begad, sir, the headquarters"—of orchestral music in America. If the musical development of Chicago has not yet overborne the packing industry as a source of pride and fame it yet has much to its credit. There is no symphony organization from Boston to San Francisco free from obligation to the school of music so long and generously maintained at Chicago.

This writing is not intended to be a catalogue of the civilizing forces of Chicago. But I am almost tempted to make it so, in the wish to pay tribute to certain minor achievements. Among them I reckon the local taxicab service, sanitary in its equipment and operated in a spirit other than that of highway robbery. I should like to compliment Chicago upon the fact that at last it has achieved a first-class hotel. These and various other practical developments are truly worth noting. There is, too, that in Chicago's clubs that tends to a civilizing grace of life. I may I trust without impertinence add that in my judgment it is high time Chicago, premier city of conventions, should have a better audience room than a Coliseum that might be mistaken for a barn if it were smaller and for a railroad yard if it were bigger.

In what has been set down I have had no thought of exploiting Chicago as holding leadership in the things of high civilization. I would not needlessly offend the sensibilities of Boston, trample upon the traditional pretensions of Baltimore, seek to minimize the values that abide in "little old New York," nor thrust my beloved home town into the discard. The notable and most worthy thing about Chicago is not that it has attained preëminence in American civilization—for truly it has not. Its ideal of worth and dignity is still the packer. But many developing conditions as they present themselves to sympathetic examination do illustrate a spirit of ambition, a spirit of liberality, a generous provision for future needs of non-material kind—in short a real ambition and a sound hope beyond mere "multiplication of towns and commodities," for what is highest and best in community achievement.

My congratulations to Chicago upon the upward look of her leading men and women and upon the faith and energy with which they are backing the things that make for "intellectual and moral progress." A. H.
SAN FRANCISCO, July 12, 1920.

From Bad to Worse.

Pending negotiations between the Obregon government—if that which is no government may be so styled—and the bandit Villa affords concrete illustration of the state of affairs in Mexico. In all the commotions and transitions that have marked the six years between the Huerta régime and today there has been no change for the better—practically no change at all. The confusions and horrors with reference to which the Washington government has watchfully waited continue. The murderings, the maimings, the ravagings, the confiscations go on as merrily as ever. The rights alike of contract and humanity are wholly in abeyance.

Nor is there a sign of better things in prospect. Mexico seems less capable today of her own restoration under civilized standards than when Mr. Wilson practically drove from the seat of authority the only man whose force of character gave any hope of administrative efficiency. While we have watched and waited conditions have gone from bad to worse. What was originally an acute inflammation has become a chronic sore. The hope that any healing process may come from within is now both vain and stupid.

Every passing month serves more deeply to emphasize the fact that pacification of Mexico with rehabilitation of orderly life must come, if at all, from without; and this is only another way of saying that it must come from the United States. Under our traditions and under sanctions of the world at large, the moral responsibilities of Mexican readjustment relate directly to us; and there is in the situation an obligation that we may not shirk either in interest or in honor.

The practical difficulties of setting Mexico to rights have been vastly over-appraised. The military men who talk glibly of vast armaments as essential to pacification of Mexico wholly disregard the practical operation of moral forces. They do not take into account the fact that the representatives of intelligence and property in Mexico will welcome intervention and open to it a hundred doors. No man intelligent with respect to the conditions and spirit of Mexico questions for one moment that little more than a demonstration will be essential to establishment of American authority in the country, for in truth there are in Mexico no forces capable of sustained and morally-inspired resistance. The Obregons, the Villas, the Felix Diazes, and all the rest of the local captains of aggrandizement and disorder would fade out of sight before advancing American forces. That we should have so much as to fight a single battle in taking authority over Mexico is much to be doubted. And with American authority definitely established in the seat of government all the rest would be easy. A few companies or battalions of native rurales organized under American authority and direction would in short order clean up the confusions that flourish under the leadership of bandits of the Villa type.

Of course nothing is to be expected from or through the existing Administration at Washington. Committed in turn to a dozen policies in half a dozen years, it has been consistent and faithful in none. It has watched and waited supinely and fruitlessly; it has bluffed again and still again shamelessly. Vowing it would hold hands off, it connived to drive from the country the one man who might have pacified it. It has tamely endured repeated affronts and insults. It has permitted American citizens and aliens of other countries to be plundered and murdered. It has allowed the once high prestige of the American name in Mexico to fall into contempt and derision. It has punished the one official—Mr. Lansing—who had the manly courage even to speak with promptness and in the spirit of national self-respect. It goes without saying that nothing is to be expected from this Administration and that the country must wait with such patience as it may command for the coming into authority of rational judgment, moral courage, and a reasonable sense of moral obligation.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR.

Prohibition, et Sic de Similibus.

PORTLAND, ORE., July 9, 1920.
TO THE EDITOR—Sir: In a few years the 4th of July will be celebrated as a day of tears, lamentations, unavailing regrets, and longings for the liberty that this country enjoyed when it was under the government of King George III.

A Crisis in Rice.

SAN FRANCISCO, July 12, 1920.
TO THE EDITOR—Sir: To show the public how little real news the daily papers of San Francisco give us, reference is made to two brief articles regarding the rice situation in Havana which appeared in the shipping news column of July 10th in the two morning dailies.

The situation is a most serious one and has been agitating California Street for the last two weeks, but the papers have never mentioned the subject.

Most of the large firms and banks have fingers in the pie and the loss to be divided will be between ten and twelve million dollars gold. The situation in a nutshell is Cuba bought heavily of our merchants of rice for direct shipment from Rangoon, Siam, and China a total of some 75,000 tons—value $20,000,000—and because between the time of purchase and of arrival of the steamers in Cuba the rice market has dropped from 13 cents to 5 cents per pound the Cubans repudiate their purchases and some one will be called upon to pay the difference of $12,000,000 loss in market prices.

No names need be mentioned, but all the leading firms who do Cuban business are involved and have sent their managers to Havana, and these men are now cabling home to ask if the United States State Department can not act in forcing these Spanish firms to comply with the terms of an honorable contract.

It is a well-known fact that the Cuban traders are the hardest tight-wads of the commercial world and generally burn the fingers of all but the most expert traders. It is said that there are no Jews and no Scotchmen in Havana, as the Cuban can beat them in every game, but seriously speaking, should not our State Department see that our merchants get justice in the Cuban courts and if our people have complied with their sides of the contract that the Cuban buyers be forced to pay the drafts and take delivery of the rice, regardless of the price of the rice market.

We made "Cuba Libre," gave them a government, and today are buying their sugars at a net profit to them of over $400 United States gold per ton, and the above rice situation is the way they treat us in return.

There are some who think the trifling stevedores' strike mentioned in the papers was gotten up by the "Havana Rice Syndicate," hoping that delay might start the weevils in the rice, and then the buyers will claim rejection on account of "bad quality."

Mene, Mene, Tekel, Upharsin.

SAN FRANCISCO, July 8, 1920.
TO THE EDITOR—Sir: "A wilfu' man maun e'en hae his way." President Wilson's platform, filled with lavish encomiums of his administration from 1912 till now, and endorsing his league of nations precisely as presented by him to the Senate, was forced upon reluctant delegates of the late Democratic National Convention after the manner that the master of Dotheboys Hall administered treacle. Then, after doing things that it ought not to have done and leaving undone things that it ought to have done, the convention adjourned. Intertribal disaffections are already in evidence. McAdoo's followers worked diligently and tirelessly for his nomination, were bitterly opposed therein from the outset by Tammany Hall in particular, and by Brennan, Nugent, Taggart, and other bosses, not then united, but at one nevertheless in hostility toward the alleged Administration candidate. The clan McAdoo, however dour they may feel, will grin, of course; but does any one suppose they will "get out and whoop-her-up!"

Tammany's delegates and Nugent, Brennan, Taggart, et al., are active Sinn Feiners. Thousands upon thousands of all-American Democrats abhor Sinn Feinism—in very soberness "will view with suspicion" a Sinn Fein selection for President. They can not but feel distrust toward any one who might listen patiently to any suggestion that would tend to the disturbance of amicable relations obtaining between this country and Great Britain. Moreover, they have not forgotten their shame—the red wrath that flamed up in them—when news of the exhibition by the Irish hyphenates before the President on the eve of his departure for the peace conference reached them: "We ask you to demand from the peace conference political freedom for Ireland! Will you do it?" This, mind you, to the President of the United States, not to some ward-heeler! And the "demand," be it remembered, in no wise affecting territory of a foe, but, to the contrary, the exclusive domestic government of an ally in the war! They will long remember that choice but characteristic bit of Irish hyphenate impertinence.

After the convention adjourned Mr. Bryan said that failure to adopt a prohibition plank "opened the door to the nomination of a 'wet' candidate." Mark Sullivan, a very careful reporter, also reported that "Tammany's 'wet' forces won the nomination for Cox," being aided therein by Brennan, "political successor to the old Sullivan machine of Illinois," by Nugent of New Jersey, "most aggressive 'wet' of the country," and others of lesser note of the same ilk. Tammany announced before starting westward that its delegates were "wet." After it became certain that Edwards (self-proclaimed "wet") and the favorite sons were out of the running, the "wets," marshaled by Tammany, united on Cox. Cox's candidacy in his own state has always had the support of the "wets." These facts will have significance for temperance folk of Democratic politics throughout the land. They have never been in doubt touching the significance of prohibition in the states, nor as to the strength of the forces behind that forced the Congress to propose the Eighteenth Amendment, nor of the force behind that impelled legislatures to adopt that amendment. They know that but for the grim and mighty hand of Mars they would never have been delivered from the hands of the whisky barons—mightier even than government in times of peace. Nor are they under any delusion as to the source of the cry for legislative relief that is being lifted up in the land. They are not fools. They realize perfectly that the purveyors of light beers and wines are but the skirmishers; that behind the skirmishers the solid columns of the old-time, sullen, insolent barons of Barleycorn are massed for attack and that they are out to reconquer the seats of the mighty and to repossess the halls of legislation! "And Achan, the son of Zerah, committed a trespass in the accursed thing, and wrath fell on all the congregation of Israel."

* * * * *
Look! Do you not see it blazing—there on the wall! Thou hast been weighed in the balance and found wanting! The people of the United States are tired of the Democratic party; tired of a party that (per its party platform) approves of all that the leader of that party has done during his incumbency, including, of course, the "watchful waiting" scandal, the shameless pussyfoot avowal, "too proud to fight," etc. Bah!

In the last congressional election President Wilson deliberately turned out of the path both of precedent and propriety to ask the country to elect a Democratic Congress—and was denied!
EDWARD A. BELCHER.

THE EX-EMPRESS EUGENIE.

The death of the ex-Empress Eugénie at the age of ninety-four, which occurred at Madrid on July 11th, severs well nigh the last link with the régime of Napoleon. The ex-empress, Eugénie Marie de Montijo, was born in Andalusia, and was educated in France, Spain, and England. She married the Emperor Napoleon III on January 30, 1853, and her only son, the Prince Imperial, was born March 26, 1856.

When the charming Countess de Montijo married the Prince Imperial in the early 'fifties, says a writer some few years ago in the Literary Digest, poets vied in singing her praises and finding similes for her loveliness. She had come from Spain, and she had been fascinating enough at twenty-seven to catch the gilded roué Louis Napoleon. And then began a life that is seldom equaled outside of story books. The French Empire came and went, and the republic rose from its ashes. But the empress lived through it all, surrounded with only the memories of triumphs. In 1916 the London Daily Chronicle said of her declining days:

The Empress Eugénie, who was once the most beautiful woman in France, is today the most wonderful old lady in the world. Not long since she celebrated her ninetieth birthday.

At the age of fourscore years and ten the vitality of the empress is extraordinary. Since the war began she has, of course, discontinued her travels, but up to her eighty-seventh year she took an annual trip in her yacht or on a steamer. Queen Victoria was not fonder of the open air; and as in her youth she delighted to be on horseback, to ride swiftly, and to hunt, so in old age she found her chief pleasures at sea, which is never too rough for her. All the coasts of the Mediterranean are known to the empress; when past eighty she returned to Egypt, and the Indies, of which she has beheld but the fringe, she still hopes to visit.

The empress must always be occupied. She has the royal mania for building, and has wrought great changes at her lovely Hampshire home, Farnborough.

"If she did not assiduously watch the building works which she orders to be carried out, they would not interest her," says one person of her. "Nothing is left to chance. She occupies herself with everything, even the slightest details, and attaches as much importance to the harmony of a building as to the shape of a door, the exact place for a piece of furniture, the color of a carpet. When a new idea occurs to her it must be executed immediately. She explains and discusses everything, is eager to see the work begun, asks the advice of this one and that one, remains standing for hours together, is untiring, holds out against fatigue longer than any one, and will not leave the place until she is satisfied with what is being done."

Thus Farnborough, we were told, became one of the most elaborate residences in Britain, as it is also one of the best Napoleonic museums in Europe. Here, as at sembled all the relics that came to her through the Bonaparte family, including even the wash-basin which the Little Corporal took with him in his campaigns. And here the faded rose of a dead empire passed most of her last days, alone with the shadows of glory. Says the account:

Every morning sees the empress in her study, with her large-scale maps before her, following the course of the war. It has been said that she has long lived altogether in the past, but this is not the case. She does not shrink from recalling it, but she has a wonderful power of detaching herself from it, and this she can do even when she visits Paris and walks in the gardens of the Tuileries. Since the war commenced she has followed the whole course of it with characteristic mental energy. As early as the autumn of 1914 (after having visited in the spring and early summer Cap Martin, Paris, Milan, Venice, and the King and Queen of Spain at Madrid—eighty-eight years of age!) her majesty converted a wing of her house into a sanatorium for wounded officers, and no day, save when prevented by indisposition, has she failed to pay a call in each of the eight rooms and chat with all the patients. "Soldier talk," it is said, comes naturally to her, and for many years her dinner guests have included officers stationed at Aldershot. One day in September, 1914, the empress had a visit from Lord Portsmouth, a former under-secretary of war.

He found her, it is said, intently studying the maps, and remained to dine with the empress, who, when they had seated themselves at table, said apologetically to her guest: "I can offer you only a diner de guerre, you know, as my cooks have left to join the army in France."

From Edward Legge, who has just published a volume on this subject, it might be inferred that, if the Empress Eugénie had no other occupation, her correspondence alone would provide a fair day's work.

"It is the sole work of one person to examine this correspondence before submitting it to the empress, who herself verifies the accuracy of the statements."

Begging letters are received from every country in the world, and apparently there are persons in France who think that Eugénie is still their empress, for she is occasionally asked to set some petitioner up in a bureau de tabac. Neither in France nor in England has the empress ever scattered recklessly what is believed to be a very considerable fortune (none but herself knows the amount), but her alms are lavishly bestowed, and for the most part carefully concealed.

She detests fuss, and over-zealous people weary her. She does not want any one to carry her cloak or her sunshade, being quite persuaded that a woman of ninety can very well do these things herself. Locks of hair, old gloves, and all such idolatrie macabre she cordially despises. At the age she has reached, far from seeking to use up the energies of friends or attendants, she prefers to rely on her own powers. She is the most independent woman of ninety in Europe. Her eye is keen and clear, her voice vibrates, her pen is driven by a steady hand. She astonishes every one who approaches her. She has a determined and determinate thoroughness for all under her roof and her servants hold the empress in nothing less than affection. In her own words, they are not her "domestics," they are her "serviteurs"; and in France, at all events, there is a certain nice difference in the terms.

The Cincinnati Enquirer, noting the fact that the King and Queen of England went to have tea with the empress on an occasion in 1916, said:

Poor old lady! How utterly hollow to her thought must be the state in which she still moves, to be still addressed as "your majesty," and to exchange courtesies with royalty. Her bitterest enemies, if enemies she still may have, could hardly wish her a sadder life than that of his survival of all that was ever dear to her in the power of her influence over men, her vanities, friendships, devotion of husband, love of only child, admiration of the millions who thought of her only frankly to admire her grace and beauty.

And the tragedies she aided in bringing to nations! There was that of Maximilian in Mexico, and then insistence upon "my war," as she called it, that of 1870, with Prussia in which French armies were destroyed or captured, a billion francs indemnity wrung from the people, Alsace and Lorraine gone. Then the Commune and flight to England, sad life at Chislehurst, death of the deposed emperor, and finally the killing of her son in British service in Zululand. He who was to have been Napoleon IV run through with an assegai by a greasy Zulu!

But Eugénie made amends for her errors of head. Perhaps she had few or no errors of heart. Certain it is that millions of her countrymen will remember her with affection and reverence.

THE VOICE OF THE PRESS.

The San Francisco Platform.

(New York Tribune.)

The San Francisco platform is a colorless and unexplicit instrument. On important matters which divide public opinion it is silent or it dodges.

Thus it is silent concerning prohibition, offers nothing specific with respect to the reconciliation of employer and employed, has nothing to suggest as to the railroads except to wait, avoids the tariff question, outlines no merchant marine policy, is cloudy as to Mexico and straddles the treaty and Irish issues.

Political platforms are commonly designed to cajole and deceive, while avoiding anything likely to cause party disharmony. So the vague and evasive San Francisco declaration is no novelty. But seldom has there been indefiniteness so open, and a new high-water mark of wordiness is set.

The Irish plank must prove particularly offensive to those honestly believing in the validity of Irish national aspirations. By declaring sympathy with the principle of self-determination the hope that something will be done for Ireland is held out. But then follows the proviso that nothing is to be done which is not "within the limitations of international comity and usage." As it would be contrary to international comity and usage to intervene in the dispute between Britain and Ireland, the plank, if it means anything, means that nothing is to be done unless Britain freely consents. It is for men of Irish birth and extraction to determine how they regard this. But to an outsider it looks as if Irish aspirations are not sympathized with, but flouted and insulted.

The platform is heavily charged with extreme partisanship and is full of misstatements of fact. The Democratic party claims to be progressive. Yet its most recent entry with respect to a great progressive measure is furnished by its attitude toward the ratification of the woman suffrage amendment. Twenty-eight Republican states have voted against seven Democratic ones. The legislation of the Democratic states with respect to social amelioration is of the Dark Ages. Nevertheless the other party is most energetically attacked for non-progressiveness.

The platform, except the announcement of the party's conversion to reservations to the covenant, and perhaps the Irish plank, is not likely to be much discussed. It will drop to the oblivion where it plainly belongs. Many complain of the speak-easy quality of the Chicago platform. Compared with its brother of San Francisco, the Chicago product is a model of decisiveness.

Progressive Sulkers and Diners.

(New York Times, July 3d.)

Out in California a strong man sits broken-hearted beside the sad sea waves. Conscious of being one of the "original" Progressives, the running mate, in fact, of Colonel Roosevelt in 1912, Hiram Johnson left the Chicago convention profoundly dejected. He had there seen both Progressive doctrines and Progressive candidates contemptuously treated. He had seen the Old Guard of hated memory resume business at the old stand, say laughily, as Johnson himself gives the language, "the public be damned," and joyously nominate Senator Harding. After that spectacle Johnson had just strength enough left to drag himself back to California, there to suffer and sulk.

Though he refuses to talk—as yet—he probably reads the newspapers. And it must add a new pang to his personal tragedy when he learns that in New York the Progressives are gayly dining and pledging support to Harding. No such painful contrast has been presented since the Lisbon earthquake. "In Paris they dance," wrote Voltaire. "In New York they dine," may exclaim the stricken Johnson.

Seeking further details of what must seem to him the heartless banqueting of Progressives on Thursday night in New York, he will find that the merry-makers described themselves as "followers of the late Theodore Roosevelt." Then he will discover that what they particularly like about Senator Harding is that he "does not believe in a one-man government." After that, anything is possible. And Johnson will therefore be braced for the shock of reading that these festive Progressives are proud to recall the fact that they were "all active in the third party movement," but are now just as proud to be reabsorbed into the Republican party, led by a man who denounced Colonel Roosevelt eight years ago as an offensive compound of Benedict Arnold and Judas Iscariot.

This rush back to the party from which the Progressives came out in 1912, as from an unclean thing, will doubtless embitter the grief of Hiram Johnson and some other simple-minded Westerners. But in others it can not fail to provoke a little quiet laughter. They will see in it the final and complete demonstration that the great Progressive holt of 1912 was purely a personal affair. The chief principle in it was that of following a leader, no matter where he gave orders to go. Now that he is gone, the Progressive party is gone. Therefore order the dinner and have a Harding love feast.

"Make me a headboard, mister, smooth and painted, you see:

Our ma she died last winter, and sister and Jack and me, Last Sunday, could hardly find her, so many new graves about.

And Bud cried out, 'We've lost her,' when Jack gave a little shout.

We have worked and saved all winter—been hungry sometimes, I own—

But we hid this much from father under the old doorstone. He never goes there to see her; he hated her; scolded Jack When he heard us talking about her, and wishing she'd come back.

But up in the garret we whisper, and have a good time to cry. Our beautiful mother who kissed us, and wasn't afraid to die: Put on it that she was forty, in November she went away, That she was the best of mothers, and we haven't forgot to pray;

And we mean to do as she taught us—be loving and true and square,

To work and read, to love her, till we go to her up there. Let the board be white, like mother"—the small chin quivered here,

And the lad coughed something under, and conquered a rebel tear.

"Here is all we could keep from father—a dollar and thirty cents;

The rest he has got for coal and flour, and partly to pay the rents."

Blushing the white lie over, and dropping the honest eyes, "What is the price of headboards, with writing, and handsome size?"

"Three dollars?"—a young roe, wounded, just falls with a moan; and he,

With a face like the ghost of his mother, sank down on his tattered knee,

"Three dollars! and we shall lose her, next winter in the graves and the snow!"

But the boss had his arms about him, and cuddled the head of tow

Close up to the great heart's shelter, and womanly tears fell fast:

"Dear boy, you shall never lose her. O, cling to your sacred past!

Come tomorrow, and bring your sister and Jack, and the board shall be

The best that the shop can furnish; then come here and live with me."

* * * * *

When the orphans loaded their treasure on the rugged old cart

next day,

The surprise of a footboard varnished, with all that their love could say;

And "Edith St. John, Our Mother!" Baby Jack gave his little shout,

And Bud, like a mountain daisy, went dancing her doll about. But Phil grew white and trembled, and close to the boss he crept,

Kissing him like a woman, shivered and laughed and wept: "Do you think, my benefactor, in heaven that she'll be glad?"

"Not as glad as you are, Philip. But finish this job, my lad."

A committee has recently started in London to raise £10,000 to purchase the house called Wentworth Place, formerly known as Lawn Bank, which was the last home in England of the poet Keats. This house is situated close to Hampstead Heath. Attention was called to it when the place was offered for sale as an eligible building site. Next year is the centenary of the death of Keats.

INDIVIDUALITIES.

Stanislaw Roman Lewandowski, the sculptor, was born in 1857 and educated at the Academy of Fine Arts in Cracow, and later in Vienna. In 1886 he received the Imperial Medal for his "Thetis Praying to Jove for the Revenge of the Trojans," and in 1887 the Gold Medal at Warsaw for "Slave Breaking Chains," which is now at Cracow. He has been a consistent contributor and art critic to the Weekly Review, the Illustrated Weekly, and other Galician periodicals.

Miss Adelaide Wright is head of the most unique lost and found bureau in the world. Her specialty is not diamonds or Pekingese pups or silver mesh bags—but people. And these she finds at the rate of several hundred a month. As the head of the Personal Service Bureau of the Near East Relief Miss Dwight locates and reunites the missing members of Armenian families whose relatives here have had no word of them since the deportations, and Armenian-Americans in this country for whom their kinsmen in the old have sent inquiries.

Calvin Coolidge, who now is well on the way to Washington, if we are to believe the predictions of his friends, lives in one-half of a two-family house in Northampton, Massachusetts, when he is at home. He pays $32 a month rent and has a three-room apartment in a hotel in Boston (not the best hotel in the city either). He visits his old home near Plymouth, Vermont, regularly each year and plows and stacks hay and rides horseback into the village for provisions for the week-end. His wife and two young sons declare he is "a mighty fine father and husband."

Perry Hale, former football hero of Yale, is now blind. But for his own unconquerable soul and unshaken body, but for his wife's strong devotion, but for his faithful pal, Bill, his Scotch collie, and but for the friends who answer his letters, the man who was unmoved by wild Yale cheers and idolatry and love twenty years back would have long ago given way to despair. Though like a stricken Saul, he is just as buoyant and confident and cheery and magnetic of personality, smiling through his blindness, as in the day when he was the idol of Yale's followers and hero of the team that made the finest record of any eleven Yale has turned out.

The retirement of Dr. McMaster from the University of Pennsylvania carries us back to 1883, the year, not only when he joined its faculty, but when there appeared the first volume of his great work. While McMaster has taught at the University of Pennsylvania for thirty-seven years, his largest classes have been the readers of his history—a history of which he published the first volume at his own risk, but which has been read beyond any rival. He was the first really to give an account of the progress of society apart from the conventional "events" of history. He was the first to bring into American history such topics as the actual methods of politics or the labor problem. He was the first Eastern historian to give something like fair treatment to the South and the West.

The Right Hon. H. A. L. Fisher, M. P., Minister of Education and President of the Board of Education, holds a unique portfolio. Mr. Fisher as a member of the British cabinet shares the responsibility of the government. But aside from that he is the most all-round man in the British system. Mr. Fisher was one of the three men responsible for the Irish bill. He does a great deal of speaking on his own subject, but it is not unusual to read his speeches on housing, labor, and many kindred topics. To follow his activities for a week one might be tempted to speak of him as a "Jack of all trades," but surely the other line of that familiar couplet does not apply. He is responsible for what is termed "England's educational charter," the education bill of 1918. This bill has done more for education of the masses in England than any previous measure in its compulsory school attendance for all children until eighteen years old in the so-called continuation schools after work hours.

From his association with the late Rev. H. Boswell Bates, founder of the Neighborhood House, George A. Merritt learned how little was being done to make cripples self-supporting and how common, almost universal, was the belief that owing to various afflictions these unhappy ones must always be a burden on others. This was not his belief, and so strong did he hold an opposite conviction that, with the aid of a few charitable persons whom he inspired with it, he founded the Path School at 60 West Twenty-Fifth Street, New York, in order to teach cripples commercial and railroad telegraphy and thus give to them that greatest boon, a means of livelihood. This school is still young, but it has already proved itself many times over. It trains legless, armless, and deformed persons, but especially the young who are thus afflicted, either in the course laid out by the school or in some other line most suitable to individual cases. It is free to all, non-sectarian, and it has already in its short life lifted nearly fifty poor creatures from a state of dependence, or even penury, to positions where by honest labor they earn from $12 to $18 per week and have the joy that comes from self-support.

THE PRIME MINISTER.

Mr. Harold Spender Writes a Life of Lloyd George with Special Emphasis on His War Career.

David Lloyd George, although a Welshman, was born in Manchester on January 17, 1863. His father dying at about the time of his birth, the child was taken by his relatives to Wales, to the little village of Llanystumdwy—Welsh of the Welsh in name, situation, and tradition. It was in this little village that David grew from infancy to manhood.

Mr. Harold Spender, who writes this biography of the British premier, wisely confines his narrative of his hero's childhood to the briefest dimensions. We are spared the usually tiresome domestic details with which the biographer so often encumbers his work. On the fiftieth page we find a reference to the young man's admiration for Joseph Chamberlain, who at that time was the hope and inspiration of British radicalism. He writes an article for the North Wales Observer in which he describes Chamberlain as "unquestioningly the future leader of the people." In 1884 David Lloyd George went to London to pass his final law examination, and he describes the ceremony of admission as disappointing:

On the occasion of this visit to London he again attended the House of Commons, and for the first time listened to a debate. He was fortunate enough to be present at a lively skirmish between Lord Randolph Churchill and Mr. Gladstone. "It was a clever piece of comedy," he said some years afterwards, recalling the scene. "I thought Churchill an impudent puppy, as every Liberal was bound to do—but I thoroughly enjoyed his speech." Then, as now, he could never sufficiently express his admiration for courage in any field of life and on any side.

Lloyd George's first cause célèbre was in connection with the burial of an old Welsh quarryman. The rector refused to allow the old man to be buried in that part of the graveyard consecrated to members of the Church of England, assigning to him a spot "bleak and sinister," a place reserved for shipwrecked sailors and suicides. The indignant relatives of the dead man consulted David Lloyd George:

Without any hesitation Mr. Lloyd George advised them to act on their rights. Following his daring counsel, they entered the graveyard and reopened the filled-in grave. Then they made a pathetic appeal to the rector. He still forbade them to act. Then they made a demand on the rector. He still refused. Meanwhile young David had spent a fortnight in foraging and rummaging through the church records, and he had discovered that in 1864 the rector had allowed the public to enclose the piece of ground without any conditions. He advised the relatives to go on. Let them, if necessary, break into the churchyard.

They went on. They broke into the churchyard. They borrowed a bier from the church. They gave the old man a Christian burial by his daughter. The Calvinist minister spoke the service, and the relatives went home happier—contented with the feeling that they had buried the old man where he had wished to lie.

The courts confirmed the young man in his action, and the name of David Lloyd George was heard of all over the country.

His next great incursion into the public field was in connection with the Boer war. Lloyd George was what was known as a pro-Boer. He opposed the war tooth and nail and he entered into a campaign against it throughout the length and breadth of the country. He was now a member of Parliament, and although many of his parliamentary friends refused to join him he went straight on and faced the music in every part of the kingdom:

Since John Bright's great fight against the Crimean war nothing of the kind had been seen in England. It is no light thing to meet the war passion full front.

But none of these fears held back Mr. Lloyd George at this great moment. He went everywhere and faced hostile crowds in the very heart of the war country. He faced a violent mob at Glasgow; he defied Mr. Chamberlain's own followers at Birmingham; he narrowly escaped death in one of his own boroughs—Bangor.

Whatever men might think of his views, no one could deny his courage. It was no easy campaign to conduct. The charge of treason was always in the air. "Do you wish the Boers to win?" shouted a heckler after one of his most eloquent defenses of the Dutch Republicans. He was silent for a moment, then he said slowly and impressively: "God defend the right!"

Lloyd George speedily made a name for himself in Parliament. He was the spokesman of the unbroken radicalism of Wales. He championed free trade and all of the ameliorative reforms that were then coming to the front in England. Mr. Asquith took the lead and Lloyd George was always his faithful "junior." Chamberlain was the first statesman to recognize the existence of that England which so few statesmen had yet recognized—the England of the poor:

As the campaign went on Mr. Chamberlain grew bolder and bolder along these lines. He contended that tariffs, and tariffs alone, would provide the money for Old Age Pensions. He hinted at even vaster booms that were coming to England if she would only turn her back on that sour and pinchbeck old lady—Free Trade.

Mr. Lloyd George perceived at once the danger of this attack. He, at any rate, knew the "deep sighing of the poor." He realized the black abyss which lay below the surface of England's wealth. He feared the appeal to the hungry mouths of our neglected masses.

From that day forward he set out to prove that Free Trade also could remedy poverty—aye! and remedy it all the more easily because it brought wealth in its train. The great need was that that wealth should hear its due burden. That was to be his cure for the trouble.

In 1908 Lloyd George went on a tour through Germany. At Stuttgart he witnessed a scene that he must have often recalled. He saw the experimental flight of one of the first Zeppelins and the disaster that befell the new monster. Bethmann-Hollweg treated the visitor with distinction. He invited him to dinner at the Zoological Gardens, and Lloyd George, for the honor of England, or perhaps of Wales, did his best to cope with the gigantic glasses of foaming beer:

Bethmann-Hollweg did not talk politics until towards the end of dinner. The conversation drifted to King Edward's visit to the Russian Czar at Réval. That visit had caused a great ferment in Germany, and grave suspicion of British intentions. Bethmann-Hollweg voiced those suspicions in the frankest manner. "You are trying to encircle us!" he cried to Mr. Lloyd George. "You and France and Russia are attempting to strangle us!"

Mr. Lloyd George assured him of the friendliness of Great Britain towards all the great powers; but for the moment he refused to be appeased. He thumped the table with his hand. "The Prussian government has only to lift a finger," he cried, "and every living Prussian will die for the Fatherland!"

Mr. Lloyd George listened to all this with his characteristic calmness and good humor. "But what about the other Germans?" he put in at this point.

A shadow passed over the face of the Prussian minister. "Oh! they?" he said with a gesture. "They, too, will come along!"

From the moment of the declaration of war against England, Lloyd George put away all his doubts and perplexities. He could understand opposing a war, but he could not understand supporting a war in a half-hearted way. He prepared to bend the whole energies of the state to the colossal problem confronting it:

He realized at once that Great Britain was up against the most terrible danger that had ever faced it in the whole course of its existence. He knew Germany; he had a thorough understanding of German efficiency. Especially did he grasp the full strength and power given to the German government by the patriotism of the German people. In entering upon this mighty enterprise, he approached the matter with the utmost gravity and seriousness. I never saw him so grave-minded as he was during those first months of the war. We rallied him one morning at breakfast for refusing to laugh at some jest. "The times are very serious," he said, and once more he seemed to be lost in his own thoughts again. He used to describe the moment when the Western world paused from peace to war as the most solemn and awful in his whole life. "We sat waiting for Big Ben to strike the hour when the ultimatum expired. We all fell quite silent. As the great blows of the hammer sounded on the bell we seemed to be passing into another world."

The situation looked black in February, 1915, although Italy had declared war against Austria, and Botha, the Boer general, had conquered the Germans in Southwest Africa. In the autumn of 1915 Lloyd George issued his great war address foreshadowing the need of conscription. In the dramatic climax of that address he said:

If the nation hesitates, when the need is clear, to take the necessary steps to call forth its manhood to defend honor and existence; if vital decisions are postponed until too late; if we neglect to make ready for all probable eventualities; if, in fact, we give ground for the accusation that we are slouching into disaster as if we were walking along the ordinary paths of peace without an enemy in sight—then I can see no hope. But if we sacrifice all we own, and all we like for our native land; if our preparations are characterized by grip, resolution, and a prompt readiness in every sphere—then victory is assured.

The winter months passed, and Lloyd George was now called upon to face the deficiency in munitions and to meet the demand for a larger supply of guns. There were rumors of heavy British losses through inferior artillery:

In February a new danger became instantly vital. The news came from the east of Europe of the definite breakdown of the Russian armaments. Their gigantic armies threatened to become unarmed mobs.

In the worst things were little better. During February and March fuller details began to reach London—of one British machine gun against ten German; of four British shells against forty German. The suppression of the free and independent war correspondent had cast a veil of silence over the realities of the war. The truth was struggling to come through; and not all the efforts of all the censors could entirely suffocate and strangle it. But it meant that any zealous minister had to fight hard against a lethal atmosphere of secrecy that soon bred ignorance.

A still greater danger that had to be met was from the war weariness at home and the discontent that arose from the forced labor in the factories. It became necessary to tap other sources of labor, and so the women were called to the aid of the men:

Mr. Lloyd George ventured on a bold appeal. He asked the women to come from their pleasures and their comforts; he asked them to save the lives of their brothers, their sweethearts, and their husbands. They came in multitudes. They filled the ranks, and they filled the shells. They silenced their sourest critics, even in their own sex. They worked by day and they work by night. They earned for themselves a new position in the state. They showed that women could be patriots themselves, as well as the wives and mothers of patriots. Not easily will England forget those splendid women of 1915-18.

The greatest and most exacting of all the tasks was the munition-making. In June, 1915, the army had only 75,000 shells on hand. When Lloyd George left the Ministry of Munitions in June, 1916, he had provided shells in millions. He himself mastered the technic of shell-making; he visited the factories and studied the machinery:

The real secret, indeed, of his work was that he kept in touch with the armies of the western front, constantly visiting them, studying their needs on the spot, listening to the actual fighting men. Above all he studied the German inventions. After a short while, thanks to the labors of our young scientists from the universities, he was able to provide our soldiers with gas-masks that enabled them to face unshaken the worst devilry of the enemy, and with gas that was a fit reply to theirs. He provided our men with flame-throwers which made them a fair match when they faced the flame-throwers of the Teuton.

I remember his taking me, one day in 1915, to see his little collection of these horrible devices in the basement of the old Metropole Hotel. He showed me the model shells, mounting by slow gradations to a giant's height. He lingered half-way along this row of shells. He put his hand on one. "When I started the ministry," he said, "our shells only went as high as this. The German shells went to the top of the range. Was that fair to our soldiers?" It was a vivid illustration of what they were achieving.

The last year of the war was the most critical, and we have General Ludendorff's testimony to the effect that the chief reason for the German defeat was the war spirit which had been aroused in England by Lloyd George and in France by Clemenceau. The author tells us of some of the scenes as untrained boys marched away to the firing line:

Another scene comes back to me from those dark days. I was standing in front of one of the large-scale maps at Downing Street, noting the point reached by the Germans in one of those tremendous and determined efforts to drive us into the sea during the April of 1918. There was the sound of a step behind us, and suddenly we turned to find the Prime Minister also observing the map with a close and concentrated gaze. We knew that things were serious, and that there were influences at the centre in favor of withdrawing our armies from France. But of all the company he was the serene. "Serious? Yes!" he said. "But by no means desperate. Look here!" and he pointed to the north of Calais. "We can flood that area if necessary. Then, if they drive us south of Calais, we can still hold on. France is a large place, and it has many ports. Retire from France? No, we will stand by our Allies to the last!" And he went away singing, as undismayed as those boys whom I had seen marching to France. A worthy leader of a worthy nation!

On another day I remember him describing to me a visit he had paid to the fighting line at the most critical moment of that great peril. He spoke with flashing eyes. "We motored," he said, "from the coast right up to the fighting front, and we did not meet a single British soldier in flight. Not one had turned his back to the enemy, not one!" Yet during that time the German guns were enfilading our trenches lined with English boys, and the chance of survival in that defense without death or injury had been reduced almost to the point of zero.

The great German offensive could be met only by sending across the Channel the entire forces that had been reserved for home defense. But the numbers were still insufficient. The Germans were working on the calculation that the Americans could not come across until 1919 or 1920, but the Americans only required the S. O. S. signal, says the author, and Lloyd George determined to give it:

One morning that spring he made up his mind. "We have to get 500,000 Americans over in four months, at the rate of 125,000 a month. How can that be done?" That was the problem as he saw it and as he expressed it. He began to send a series of telegrams to President Wilson through Lord Reading, explaining to Mr. Wilson the peril and the need of instant help. President Wilson immediately grasped the crisis. Mr. Lloyd George organized the Navy and the Merchant Service for the work of transport on the British side of the Atlantic, and President Wilson did the same on his side. So began that great Armada of help from the New World. The American divisions poured across the Atlantic, overcrowded on their transports, packed almost to suffocation, but willing to suffer all things in the great crusade on which they were bent. The Americans, indeed, did far better than the British government had expected. They sent a million men. It was a magnificent performance, and must ever be remembered to the credit of that great nation.

It is to be hoped that Mr. Lloyd George may yet give occasion for an extension of his biography and that many years of service lie in front of him. In the meantime we may appreciate to the full the excellent volume that Mr. Spender has given us.

THE PRIME MINISTER. By Harold Spender. New York: George H. Doran Company.

The conventional saw has recently appeared in a new rôle, namely, as a musical instrument. Indeed one of the leading novelties of a current New York musical revue is the musical carpenter, who uses his saw as a violin. After protracted experimentation and untiring practice, Sam Moore of New York City has succeeded in getting very agreeable music from the ordinary carpenter's saw. He holds the saw handle between his legs, holds the tip of the saw in one hand, and works the usual violin bow with the other. The vibrating steel blade emits soft, appealing notes, the pitch of which is varied by changing the curvature of the blade. All sorts of queer effects can be obtained by the adept manipulation of the blade; in fact the music derived by this means can hardly be described. If anything, it resembles the human voice; then again, it has the queer wail of the Hawaiian ukulele. All in all, the effect is startling and pleasing.

It appears that a London financier has been treated with monkey glands given by Dr. Voronoff and has been reduced in age from seventy-two to thirty-six. His name is Robert George Laws. If this is true, a grave danger menaces us. As the supply of monkeys is limited, there not being as many of them as there are human beings, it is evident only those people who can afford to pay for it are going to be restored to youth. We understand that Mr. Bryan has considerable money saved up. If he gets hold of some of the monkey glands and is made over into twenty-five he can run for the presidency for the next fifty years without interruption. And that is only one instance. God help us, say we, if this thing gets started.—Life.

BANKING AND INVESTMENT NEWS.

San Francisco's bank clearings for the week ending July 10, 1920, were $128,400,000; for the corresponding week of last year, $137,900,000; a gain of $9,500,000.

Every total item in the report of the Federal Reserve Bank of San Francisco for the week ending July 9th showed gains over the previous week's items, according to the bank's weekly statement issued Saturday. The feature of the report was the big increase of $11,189,000 in total gold held by member banks. Gold reserves were higher by $3,169,000 as compared with the week before.

Total bills on hand increased $4,947,000 to $199,003,000, while earning assets jumped $3,864,000 to $212,965,000 and resources rose $3,344,000 to $426,617,000.

Upon the United States rests the responsibility of making up the tremendous world-the amount Belgium can export will not greatly affect the international market in the immediate future.

"The only active competitors of the American iron and steel producers at the present time are the iron-makers of the United Kingdom. Steel output in the United Kingdom during the first five months of 1920, although at a lower rate than in 1917, was above the rate for any other year. Exports of iron and steel must still increase before they reach the rate maintained in 1913. Remarkable increases over exports for 1919 are shown by the British figures for the first four months of 1920. Gains were made in all the items except six, the gain for the different classes of products ranging from 8 per cent. to over 400 per cent. The British position is improving and must not be underrated.

"The arrears caused by four years' destruction of steel and by reduced output after the armistice can not be made up in the near future by any country except the United States. Yet in the first calendar year after the war American pig-iron output dropped to 31,015,000 tons, which was 8,000,000 tons below that of 1918 and practically the level of 1913. The fact that this reduction occurred without financial or industrial disturbance is a matter for congratulation, but in view of the five years' accumulated need of steel throughout the world it is a calamity. The first three months of 1920 showed an expanding rate of production, but the railroad strike brought about a serious reduction, so that the April output of pig-iron dropped to 2,740,000 tons. The total for the first five months of 1920 was 15,000,000 tons. In spite of fluctuations, production in the United States is being maintained at a rate more than double the present output of Germany and the United Kingdom combined.

"Despite unfavorable exchange, Canada must buy American sheets and plates to keep the wheels turning in her own industries. The United Kingdom received much larger quantities of steel ingots and billets from the United States in March, 1920, than during the corresponding month of 1919. Steel for shipbuilding was exported to France in April of this year in spite of exchange difficulties, and shipments of steel plates to Italy in March exceeded those made in March, 1919. It is to be expected that foreign customers will restrict their purchasing at times in response to disadvantageous exchange conditions, but in such periods the shortage grows and must eventually be met.

"Even assuming a production of pig-iron in 1920 equal to that of the best war year, and a rate of export somewhat higher than that of the pre-war years, the exportable surplus of the United States is not likely to equal Germany's annual exports in the years immediately preceding 1914. The United Kingdom is unable at present to recover her former volume of exports except at a sacrifice of domestic needs. There can be no question, therefore, as sufficient foreign outlets for all the United States can spare and more. The American iron and steel industry has the resources, the capacity, and the industrial organization to produce largely beyond domestic needs. A responsibility rests upon this country to maintain production at a point where the industry can do its share toward satisfying the world-wide need of steel."

Unfilled orders of the United States Steel Corporation for the month ending June 30th were 10,978,817 tons, it was announced Saturday. This is an increase of 31,351 tons from the previous month, when the figures were 10,947,466.

With imports into the United States aggregating $5,000,000,000 in the fiscal year just ended as against $1,894,000,000 in the year immediately preceding the war, a question naturally arises as to the class of materials in which this increase occurs. One answer could be stated in a single word, "luxuries," but happily another answer can be given in two words of a more satisfactory character, "manufacturing materials," which aggregate over $2,000,000,000 in 1920, against $633,000,000 in 1914.

Luxuries do, however, says a statement by the National City Bank of New York, show tremendous increases in the fiscal year 1920 as compared with the fiscal year 1914, which ended just before the outbreak of the war. These increases are in many cases very striking. Take the single group, "diamonds and other precious stones." The total of the entire group for the year 1920 is in round terms $120,000,000 against $34,000,000 in 1914. Diamonds alone total $95,000,000 as against $25,000,000 in 1914, pearls about $13,000,000 as against $4,000,000 in 1914.

Laces and embroideries are another item in which the 1920 total shows a tremendous gain over that of 1914, the grand total of laces and embroideries, including those of silk, fibres, and cotton, having aggregated in 1920 $120,000,000 against about $36,000,000 in 1914, the bulk of this increase occurring in cotton laces. Furs show even a greater gain, the total for 1920 being $130,000,000 against $14,000,000 in 1914.

Silk, no longer considered a luxury, shows astonishing gains, both as to manufactures and raw silk to be used by our own manufacturers. The total value of raw silk imported in the fiscal year 1920 is in round terms $450,000,000, silk manufactures $100,000,000, and artificial silk $10,000,000, making $560,000,000 worth of raw and manufactured silks imported in the fiscal year 1920 against $135,000,000 worth imported in 1914. Of raw silk, the imports of 1920 were, as above indicated, $450,000,000 as against $100,000,000 in 1914, of silk manufactures $100,000,000 against $35,000,000 in 1914, and of artificial silk $10,000,000 against $4,000,000 in 1914.

Tobacco imports in all forms show for 1920 about $90,000,000 as against $40,000,000 in 1914. Goatskins, used chiefly in the manufacture of shoes and gloves, show for 1920 a total value of approximately $125,000,000 as against $22,000,000 in 1914; fruits and nuts $125,000,000 as against $33,000,000 in 1914; olive oil $15,000,000 against $8,000,000 in 1914. Our coffee, tea, and cocoa bill for 1920 aggregates $430,000,000 in the countries of production against $150,000,000 in 1914.

Sugar, while not of course to be classed as a luxury, is another of the articles showing the enormous increase in the imports of 1920, with a total of about $750,000,000, including that brought from our own islands, against $150,000,000 in 1914.

While it is not claimed, says the bank's statement, that all of the above-named articles are properly included in the "luxuries" class, it is remarkable to what extent these big increases do occur in actual luxuries. On the other hand, the increase in manufacturing material also shows a tremendous gain, since the grand total of raw material for use in manufacturing shows for 1920 over $2,000,000,000 against $633,000,000 in 1914.

Of course, a considerable share of the above increase is due to the higher price of the articles enumerated, but in large part to actual increase in quantity.

Changed conditions in commerce and industry demand larger banking units. This is the day of bank consolidations and in many large cities in the United States important amalgamation of local banks have taken place during the last year.

The purchase of the Seaboard National Bank of San Francisco recently by Mortimer Fleishacker for the Anglo-California Trust Company marked the successful culmination of an investigation by the officers of the Trust Company regarding the advisability of establishing a branch bank near the water-front. For some time they have realized the growing importance of the business and shipping district tributary to lower Market Street, and the purchase of the Seaboard National Bank and its enlargement into a complete branch of the Trust Company is evidence of their determination to provide this growing district with the best possible banking facilities.

During the last year many reports have come to the Anglo-California Trust Company from government and city officials that sailors who made their temporary or permanent homes along the water-front were disposing of their Liberty Bonds freely, and in many instances at prices below the market because they did not have a safe place in which to keep them. The Anglo-California Trust Company was the first bank in San Francisco to start a Liberty Bond safe-keeping department, wherein Liberty Bonds and War Savings Stamps are kept free of charge for the public. When these reports came from government officials regarding the reckless selling of Liberty Bonds by sailors and seamen the officials of the Trust Company at once decided that they would make a special effort to encourage the sailors to open Liberty Bond safe-keeping accounts. This one point, as well as a number of others, made it necessary for the Trust Company to have a branch near the water-front, so the purchase of the Seaboard National Bank was a natural result.

In the purchase of the Seaboard the Anglo-California Trust Company has acquired a very valuable institution. The bank has a well-organized commercial, savings, and safe deposit departments. For many years the Seaboard and the lumber shipping interests of San Francisco have been closely allied. It is said that this bank has done more than any other in San Francisco toward building up the city as an important lumber and shipping port.

In addition to the valuable acquisition of the Seaboard National Bank the Anglo-California Trust Company is particularly fortunate in securing a new director. James Tyson, president of the Charles Nelson Company, and a former director of the Seaboard National Bank, has been elected to the board of directors of the Anglo-California Trust Company. With the addition of Mr. Tyson, the directorate of the Trust Company now numbers fifteen prominent business men.

The Seaboard Bank (now the Seaboard National Bank) was organized on April 15, 1905,

Howell says. "The United States, Great Britain, and Germany produce 80 per cent. or more of the total iron and steel output of the world, while Belgium is a considerable factor in the international market. The war had varying effects on the industries of these three European countries. The case of Germany is clear. As a producer of iron and steel for the international market, that country need not be reckoned with at present. French production is dependent on German coal, and lack of fuel and industrial disorganization have thus far kept it much below the pre-war level. The Belgian industry shows encouraging features and exports are increasing, but domestic demand is heavy and

The Anglo-California Trust Company now has the main bank at Market and Sansome Streets, and four branches: Seaboard Branch, 101 Market Street; Fillmore Branch, Fillmore and Geary Streets; Mission Branch, Sixteenth and Mission Streets, and Potrero Branch, Third and Twentieth Streets. Through its various departments and branches the company gives a complete city-wide banking service.

With the splendid growth in new business during the last one and a half years, and with the addition of the deposits of the Seaboard National Bank, the Anglo-California Trust Company becomes one of the leading trust and savings banks in San Francisco.

The Boston Commercial Bulletin says:

"Trading in the wool market last week has been very desultory with prices showing an easier tendency. The reports from the West indicate no settled policy of doing business either on the part of the growers or sellers, some consignments being reported and a little outright buying. The market for goods is flat, as might be supposed from the general closing of the mills.

"Prices, scored basis: Texas—Fine twelve months, $1.60@1.65; fine, eight months, $1.45.

Subscriptions were opened here last week by the Federal Reserve Bank of San Francisco to two new issues of treasury certificates of indebtedness, Series B 1921 and TM2 1921. Both bear interest at 5 3/4 per cent. and are dated July 15th, and the former is due January 15th and the latter March 15th next year. The latter alone has an interest coupon attached. The total amount sought is $200,000,000, and books will be closed at a date fixed in accordance with the rapidity with which subscriptions come in. The usual tax exemptions are granted, including income taxes up to $5000. The latter issue is in anticipation of taxes. Denominations are $500, $1000, $5000, $10,000, and $100,000.

When a union man with the strike habit kicks about the price and scarcity of sugar it would be well if the grocer could show him a chart which appears in the latest issue of the American Sugar Bulletin.

This chart shows that from the first of January to the present time there has not been a day when the manufacture or shipment of sugar has not been impeded by strikes.

Plantation workers went out in Hawaii and Porto Rico. Refinery employees struck in Chalmette and Revere. Dock workers struck in Havana, Jamaica, New Orleans, and Boston. Boatmen struck in New York and Philadelphia. The railroad strike added to the agony.

Sugar, of course, is but one of the many important industries. All the others could be charted the same way. Business is completely interlocked and a strike in one line affects practically all the other lines.

The striking switchman who growls because there is no sugar in the bowl must remember that he was one of the causes. And he is being blamed by the Havana dock laborer who has no flour in the bin.—New York Sun.

The Freeman, Smith & Camp Company, who handled a large block of the $60,000,000 Armour & Co. 7 per cent. ten-year convertible gold notes, advises the Argonaut that the entire allotment has been oversold. These notes were sold at 94.84 and interest, to yield over 7.75 per cent.

Mr. F. W. Le Porin, sales manager of the bond department of Henry L. Doherty & Co., New York, recently returned from an extended tour of Europe, during which he visited Great Britain, Belgium, France, Holland, Norway, Sweden, Denmark, Germany, and other countries. Mr. Le Porin had exceptional opportunities to meet leading financiers in these countries, and he has the following to say about his impression of present financial and economic conditions across the water: "There are several factors of such uncertain and undeterminable effect upon the general international financial structure in Europe that only time and patient effort will make apparent the trend of ultimate solution. Among these factors may be mentioned the shifting of gold and its concentration in the hands of relatively few nations; the shifting of wealth from one set of individuals to another within nations; the increased standard of living and consequent abnormal increase in wages; the decrease in efficiency of labor; the probably inevitable restandardizing of fixed exchange values; the general inflation of currency and the largely decreased security thereof; the decrease in gold reserves, not only national, but provincial and local; the loss in man power, especially within the 'productive ages,' twenty to forty-five years; the decrease in birth rate; hoarding of precious metal currency; the destruction and wearing out of essential means of transportation; the possible obsolescence of some of the former means of transportation and the urgent demand of development of new means, especially aeronautics; the obvious over-reaching in the evolutionary process of democratizing of nations, such over-reaching leading to revolution; the establishment of many new nations and the revision of boundaries under the theory of self-determination; the present inadequacy of old fixed incomes; the growing importance of Asiatic influence in world economies. These are only a few of the more important factors which make for great complexity in analyzing the financial flux of the countries of Europe and speculating upon the means by which the turbid mass may be clarified."

The advice of a Federal Reserve Bank official to "sell Liberty Bonds only if necessary, and then deal only with banks or with legitimate brokerage concerns," is confirmed (says Financial America) by an experiment recently made by a newspaper man in a New York city. He had heard that prices for Liberty Bonds varied in different places, and decided to investigate. The financial daily, which thinks that his experience may be duplicated in almost any community, proceeds to tell what happened:

"He took a $100 third issue, 4 1/4 per cent. bond, and offered it for sale at a bank. There he was offered the list price in that day's quotation, which was $90.17. The bank would also redeem the attached interest coupons, totaling $7.86, making the entire sum of $98.03.

"Since his quest was purely for information, he refused this offer, and next presented his bond to a well-known legitimate brokerage firm dealing in such securities. It made the same offer as the bank, with a fee of 50 cents for handling.

"Next the investigator visited a cigar store which displayed a price-quotation board in its window, but the proprietor would give only $96.57 for the bond with its interest coupons. Thence the quest went on down the line of small dealers and pawnbrokers, the prices offered gradually diminishing, the lowest one being $83, which the pawnbroker claimed was 'about the current quotation,' though it was in reality $7.17 less than the list price for the bond without coupons. Having learned what he wanted to know, the inquisitive soul went home and put his bond away, safely."

The United States Geological Survey, Department of the Interior, has given out some preliminary figures showing the production of gold throughout the world in 1919. The production in the United States was $58,285,196; Canada is reported to have produced $14,687,000; India, $10,028,000; Australia (not including New Zealand or the Islands), $29,268,000; the Transvaal, $171,640,123; Rhodesia and West Africa, $18,631,070. There was a probably large decrease in the production of gold in Russia and Siberia in 1919. Some increase was probably made in the output of Central America and South America, which, however, was doubtless offset by decreases in the output of other countries. The incomplete returns now available indicate that the world's production of gold in 1919 was between $345,000,000 and $350,000,000. The world's production in 1918 amounted to $380,924,500.

The Geological Survey further states that information received during the first six months of 1920 indicate a still further decrease in the production of gold in the United States and that the output for the year will probably be less in 1920 than it was in 1919, because water is very short for placer mining and many stamp mills are closed. Canada as a whole may increase its output, although the production of the Yukon districts will be smaller than last year. The output of Russia can not be estimated. That of Australia will show a decrease. That of South Africa and South America will probably show no radical decrease. According to the Geological Survey the indications are that the decrease in the world's production of gold in 1920 will not be so great as it was in 1919.

While there are signs of a coming improvement in the situation of the electric railway industry of the country, as yet this has not affected the market for securities of this class of corporations (says the July Investment Bulletin of Henry L. Doherty & Co. of New York). There are more electric railway securities in default of interest today than at any other time in the history of the industry.

Many of these defaulted bonds are selling at prices that have not only discounted the default in interest, but also discount a most drastic reorganization of the issuing companies. In substantially every instance default in interest payments was due to the fact that the electric railway companies were unable to meet their fixed charges because of the restrictions under which they labored as to rates of fare. The high cost of labor and material caused by war conditions has resulted in steady increases in operating expenses so that in many instances electric railway companies have been unable to earn operating expenses on peace-time rates of fares, let alone earning sufficient money to meet their interest charges. So far as stocks of most of the electric railway companies of the country are concerned, they do not figure at all as the companies would, under present conditions and with pre-war rates of fares, be satisfied to earn fixed charges.

There have been increases in fares granted in a number of important cities of the countries, but the advance in operating expenses has very often more than taken up the increased revenue from the advanced fares. The standard 5-cent rate in these cities has been raised to 6, 7, and 8 cents, and in a few instances to 10 cents. In addition, in many cities charges have been put in effect for transfers.

The world's wheat requirements for the coming year will barely be met by the available surplus of exporting countries (says the Canadian Bank of Commerce in their monthly commercial letter on general business conditions). In the United States the yield is estimated to be less than that of last year and it would thus appear that prices for cereals will remain firm. Industrial recovery in Europe, now rapidly taking place, will maintain the demand for all kinds of foodstuffs, which are the mainstay of Canadian exports. It is also encouraging to note that sterling exchange, in which currency the greater part of our exports is paid for, is steadily rising. Domestic trade has slackened, consumers having apparently realized that the advance in prices can only be checked effectively by a lessening of consumption, and high-priced articles not ranking as essentials are now more difficult to dispose of. Progress in the construction of new industrial plants has been retarded by the difficulty of procuring capital and labor on reasonable terms. These tendencies have induced more careful purchasing, the reduction of stocks and the cancellation of orders to a limited extent. Imports, particularly from the United States, continue to be large, with the result that the premium on New York funds remains high. During May securities amounting to $25,000,000 were reported as being sold in the United States, but this had no appreciable effect on the rate of exchange. The balance of Canada's foreign trade for April, 1920, was unfavorable to the extent of $46,000,000, as against a favorable balance of $10,000,000 a year ago.

McDonnell & Co. and Stephens & Co. announce that effective July 1, 1920, Mr. John Gallois has retired from the firm of McDonnell & Co. and become associated with Stephens & Co. as vice-president. McDonnell & Co. will continue to conduct a strictly commission business in listed and unlisted stocks and bonds. The underwriting business heretofore conducted by McDonnell & Co. has been taken over by Stephens & Co. and Mr. Ben McGee of McDonnell & Co. and formerly of Kissel, Kinnicutt & Co., New York, has become associated with this firm.

The foreign trade of the United States in the fiscal year which ends with this month will make a new "high record." In both imports and exports (says a statement by the National City Bank of New York) the figures of the fiscal year 1920 will exceed in value those of any preceding year. Exports will apparently exceed $8,000,000,000 against $7,250,000,000 in the fiscal year 1919, $6,250,000,000 in 1917, and $2,333,000,000 in the year immediately preceding the war. Imports will make the astonishingly high record of $5,000,000,000 against $3,000,000,000 in 1919, a little over $2,500,000,000 in 1917, and less than $2,000,000,000 in 1914, the year preceding the war. The total foreign trade for the year will exceed $13,000,000,000 against $10,333,000,000 in 1919, slightly less than $9,000,000,000 in 1918 and 1917, and $4,250,000,000 in the year prior to the war.

Raw manufacturing material showed by far the largest growth on the import side and will apparently exceed $2,000,000,000 against $1,250,000,000 in the former high record years 1919 and 1918, and $633,000,000 in the year preceding the war. Manufactures exported will show a total of about $3,750,000,000, only exceeded in 1917, when war materials were being exported in enormous quantities, and $1,100,000,000 in the pre-war year 1914. Manufactures exported will be three and one-half times as much in value as in the year before the war and raw manufacturing ma-

Charles J. Wilson of Chicago, in an ordinary seven-passenger car, leaped over a twenty-seven-foot yawning gap where a bridge had been washed out near Elgin, Illinois, the car leaping more than twice the necessary distance, or exactly fifty-eight feet. Upon investigation of the car, no harm had been done to the engine, which was found to be running after the car landed; none of the tires burst under the terrific force of the impact as the car struck the ground after its record-breaking leap.

The Limits of Socialism.

The hest meant effort of the reformer is often damned by the label that he affixes to it. We condemn whole systems of theory and experiment because of some feature or practice that has aroused our antipathy. Socialism is under such a ban at the present time. It suggests Bolshevism or revolution or pro-Germanism. Its possible merits are submerged under its obvious demerits.

But there is something wrong somewhere. There are social evils, some of them curable, some of them incurable. The remedies must be found and the name that we give to the cure does not much matter. But the remedy will not be found in the jettisoning of a whole social and economic system and the substitution of another thereof. Evils must be diagnosed and corrected one by one.

Professor O. Fred Boucke challenges the socialist contentions. Can socialism produce so much more than individualism? Can it insure each man his product? How far may we hope for racial improvement through socialist reforms? Can the people be led to direct themselves politically? This leads us to the greatest of all questions: Is there a rationale of meliorism?

The general answer to these questions is that socialism has promised more than it can perform. We must attack our evils one by one, and not by the general application of formulas.

None the less the author's programme is a radical one. He would abolish by taxation the right of inheritance. Taxes should be revised on a collective and not an individualistic basis. Education should be made compulsory and free. All should be obliged to toil. There must be guaranteed leisure for the young and recuperation for the aged.

Humanizing Industry.

The world is gradually coming to the conviction that human labor is not a commodity, and that an economic system in which ethics hears no part is foredoomed to failure if not to calamity. It is along these lines that Mr. R. C. Feld has written his "Humanizing Industry."

He has put his arguments somewhat in the form of a novel, although we are carefully informed that it is not fiction. The purport of the hook is to show that such devices as health measures, pensions, housing, and profit-sharing are not along the lines of philanthropy, but of sound business sense, and that if they are to the advantage of the workman they are even more to the advantage of the employer. The harrier between labor and capital, says the author, must be broken down, an axiom often repeated, but difficult of application. Mr. Feld has the advantage of being able to make his characters say anything that he pleases. We are not sure that they would always speak as he would have them, nor are we sure that he makes full allowance for the desire to dominate that is inherent in human nature. None the less he writes sanely and constructively, and his book must be looked upon as a useful contribution to the greatest of all modern problems.

HUMANIZING INDUSTRY. By R. C. Feld. New York: E. P. Dutton & Co.; $2.50.

On the Ohio.

The author and his wife intended to make their journey in three phases: the first was to comprise 400 miles down the Missouri; the next about 200 miles down the Mississippi to Cairo, and the third was to cover 1050 miles up the Ohio, from Cairo to Pittsburgh. Circumstances compelled some modifications of the plan, but none the less it was a great trip.

The author is to be congratulated on a vivacious narrative that is composed almost entirely of incident and colloquy and that is withal distinctly humorous. The excellent illustrations are from drawings by Mrs. Abby.

India.

The political wisecracks of today talk fluently of the liberation of India, and of self-determination for India, in blissful ignorance of the fact that India is as deeply entrenched with frontiers, governments, religions, and languages as Europe, and that there is no such thing in India as a national sentiment or unity of thought. Over one-third of India is governed by native princes under a British supervision that is usually nominal. Antagonistic religious systems and the practice of caste stand as nearly hopeless barriers to unified political thought. Mr. Lajpat Rai has done the best that he can to present the cause of India from the standpoint of the political party to which he belongs, but it is hard to resist the conviction that he would have written a different sort of hook if his audience had been acquainted with the real conditions existing in India. The actual force of Indian unrest is not to be found in the visible political parties, all of which would be swept away in twenty-four hours in the event of Indian revolution. It lies somewhere in the mysterious and secret depths of Indian life, and these are the forces of which the government of India is most afraid. Mr. Rai's hook will doubtless satisfy the groundlings who look upon India as a nation very much as they look upon France or Italy. But it can hardly be regarded as an important contribution to a practical problem.

French Writers.

If any one is competent to summarize a literary movement without the invasion of prejudices it is Mme. Duclaux, who renders this service to the "brilliant band of twentieth-century poets and novelists who not only sang the glory of France, but readily shed their blood for the love of it." Among those thus exalted by Mme. Duclaux are Maurice Barrés, Romain Rolland, Edmond Rostand, Paul Claudel, Charles Peguy, and the Countess de Noailles.

Maurice Barrés is the religionist of the group, and yet, says the author, he seems to be inspired by a sense of ancestral piety rather than by what we usually term religion. Thus he asks that the state undertake the repair of all churches, but "it is not as a Catholic that he pleads the cause of the altar, but in the name of civilization." And he calls upon the younger generation thus to defend the altar and the heltry.

Romain Rolland is of course almost a synonym for "Jean-Christophe." He is the "great spectator of our times." But will this quality of criticism, this combination of preaching and painting, outlive the generation that called it forth? Mme. Duclaux seems to doubt it. Rolland is "perhaps one of a race who exist rather because of a certain flame of life, a force of personality, than because of the perfection of their work."

As for Rostand, he is peculiarly compared by the author with Kipling. Both are "colossal, undoubtedly, but hardly literary." There is something in them that is "inelegant, cocksure, aggressive, sometimes a little superficial." They gather no violets, "but what a quantity of buttercups and daisies."

Mme. Duclaux treats Henri Barbusse with the brevity that he merits. She does not like him. Who could? None the less, "I admire him for his reaction, his revolt against that which most of us so readily accept—the sufferings of the unknown mass. It is well that there should be writers who rouse and reveal, though their trumpet notes be harsh and unmodulated—well there should be those who shake the sleepers from their sloth and bid them save their neighbors and themselves, building anew, lest the pillars of the temple fall and crush us all in their ruin."

It would be interesting to give more of the author's brilliant summaries, but they should be read in conjunction with the evidence, so to speak. There are few hooks of literary criticism so brilliant as this.

volumes, will be less fatiguing, not only to the eyes, head, and neck, but also to the arms and hands. Mr. Winslow's idea is to print a book so that you read straight ahead from right-hand page to right-hand page, these being numbered consecutively; then, when you have read through to the last right-hand page, you turn the hook upside down and continue reading as before, what in ordinary books are left-hand pages now being right-hand pages. This, of course, involves printing all left-hand pages upside down and numbering them consecutively from the back of the hook. This would easily be arranged by the printer in laying out the forms, though to get the pagination of a large hook correct would require some nice calculation on the printer's part.

Right-Hand Pages.

"Why not print all hooks in such a way that every page is a right-hand page?" asks D. I. Winslow of Boston, who claims a patent for his conception of how to do it. He holds that if one has to read pages on one side of a hook only, this will be held more easily, the eyes will not wander, there will be no necessity for changing the position of head and neck when passing from one page to another. International Bolshevism.

Dr. Paul Miliukov needs no introduction as a patriotic and intellectual Russian whose efforts on the part of his country were cut short by revolution. That he played so large a part in the recent history of Russia is evidence of his competence as a commentator, while it may also suggest a certain caution in accepting his more pessimistic conclusions. Dr. Miliukov has lived so close to the volcano that he may sometimes exaggerate the lava flow.

The author tells us that Russian Bolshevism is one thing and international Bolshevism is another. The former is a national phenomenon. The latter a universal theory. It is with the international variety that he deals.

We may confess to only a slight interest in the history of Bolshevism in Russia, but those who are concerned with this aspect of the question will find a satisfactory narrative in Dr. Miliukov's volume. The collapse of military Russia revealed the Bolshevik movement, hitherto strictly national, as a huge and powerful machine for the propaganda of the world revolution. Attempts were made to revolutionize Germany and Austro-Hungary. Neutral countries were similarly assailed and the work still continues with disquieting results. We are told of the Bolshevik efforts in Europe, efforts that seem always to fail so far as actual outbreaks are concerned, but that always succeed in breeding discontent and in sowing the seeds of new and evil ideals in the minds of men. Toward the end of his book Dr. Miliukov gives us a résumé of Bolshevik efforts in America, and it may be said that it is a formidable one. He shows clearly the connection between Bolshevism and the Sinn Féin. A telegram from Helsingfors dated April 25th says: "The Council of People's Commissaries has rescinded the vote of 300,000,000 roubles for propaganda in France. Instead they have voted the sum of 500,000,000 roubles monthly for the bureau of general foreign propaganda. The first payment of 500,000,000 roubles, for the month of February, was sent to the Sinn Féiners in Ireland." Mr. McCartan, the "Envoy of the Republic of Ireland," says that there should exist between the Irish and the Russian Extremists "that sense of brotherhood which common purpose can alone induce."

Especially deplorable, says the author, is the "hands off Russia" and the "let Russia stew in her own juice" policy. This means the salvation of the Soviet republics. It is the policy that has been adopted by the Allied governments. The result is that "a new wave of Bolshevism is rising and sweeping over Europe." Mr. Lincoln Eyre of the New York World says: "In the seven weeks I spent in Moscow three (Communist) delegates arrived from the United States, and literally scores from Germany, Hungary, Austria, Switzerland, Scandinavia, Roumania, Bulgaria, Italy, China, Japan, Korea, India, Afghanistan, and the countries of Asia Minor. The only important states from which few Communist envoys come are Great Britain and France." Communication with Russia is now easy, and as a result our newspapers are full of letters from Russia, or of "news" from Russia, singing the praises of Lenin, Trotsky, and Zinoviev.

Dr. Miliukov's book will be described as alarmist. It will be received with incredulous apathy in America, where nothing short of accomplished facts can impinge upon the public mind. None the less one reaches the last page with a sense of foreboding which is not lessened by such scraps of news as a mysterious but very real censorship permits us to read.

"The Railroad Problem: A Suggestion," by Walter W. Davis, has been published by G. P. Putnam's Sons. It consists of a plan "for an undivided administration of the railroads, for promoting competition in railroad service, and for stimulating local initiative in railroad development." The chief feature of the plan provides for ownership of all interstate railroads by a national corporation with stock distributed among the security holders of the existing railroads.

"Gone West" is a collection of supposed communications from a "Soldier Doctor" who died in the war. There are now scores of volumes such as this, their main feature being an utter and hopeless disagreement as to the nature of the post-mortem life in which their alleged authors find themselves. Gossip of Books and Authors.

A trying illness, from which he is slowly recuperating, has not prevented John Spargo author of "Russia as an American Problem," from reading proof on his latest book on Russia, which the Harpers will bring out next month. Mr. Spargo lives very quietly at Old Bennington—as he himself describes it—"taking his work seriously, but himself not too seriously, enjoying the flowers when in good health, and working hard." Mr. Spargo's new book will be called "The Greatest Failure in All History."

The Princeton University Press published a book last month which should prove of unusual interest and value at this time. Its title is "The Constitution and What It Means Today." Its author is Edward S. Corwin, professor of jurisprudence in Princeton University. The title describes the book exactly; it contains the full text of the Constitution of the United States and all amendments, with simple explanations of all passages as interpreted during the last 130 years.

One of the most interesting of the pamphlets announced for immediate publication by E. W. Huebsch, Inc., is an American reprint of the London Nation's recent widely discussed American supplement. In this supplement were gathered together five papers, each by an authority, on as many phases of current American thought, as follows: Morris R. Cohen writes on "American Philosophy," Francis Hackett on "American Fiction," H. L. Mencken on "Chicago as a Literary Centre," Joel E. Spingarn on "American Criticism," and Padraic Colum on "American Poetry."

Vicente Blasco Ibañez sailed for his home in Spain recently on the steamer La France of the French line, after six or more exceedingly busy months in the United States and Mexico, in the course of which he traveled over a goodly part of the territory of this country, lecturing and studying American life. He expects to return for another long visit next January.

Aurora and Hertzian Waves.

That auroras may be due to Hertzian waves emitted by the sun is suggested by a distinguished scientist. Observations show, he points out, that most auroras are seen during the early hours of the night in all latitudes, and their splendor, as well as their number, diminishes through the night toward the morning. Experiment proves that, owing to the diffraction of the atmosphere, Hertzian waves, especially of great wave length, turn corners, or, in other words, pass around intervening obstacles. The waves of the wireless telegraph, for example, surmount the intervening convexity of the earth between two distant stations. It is not surprising, therefore, that auroras should be visible in the polar regions during winter, although the ordinary rays of the sun do not reach them.

Nordmann, seeing that Hertzian waves have passed between Newfoundland and England, a distance of about thirty degrees on a great circle of the earth, argues that at the equinox polar auroras should be most frequent within thirty degrees from the pole, and that has been found to be the case. It would follow from the above that auroras would be most frequent in the early hours of the night and morning, but another factor comes in. It has been proved that the luminescence of a rarefied gas is brighter the more free ions exist in it. In a small tube the free ions disappear mainly by diffusion, but in the atmosphere by recombination of positive and negative ions.

MEXICO IN REVOLUTION

By V. BLASCO IBANEZ
Author of "The Four Horsemen"

His Spanish birth gave this author a power of comprehension of the Mexican situation which few of alien race and speech ever attain. His prominence made every leader eager to gain the support of his pen. And little escaped the novelist's practised observation. These chapters written for the Chicago Tribune, New York Times and other papers immediately on his return from Mexico are quite unrivalled in interest and authority.

The upper atmosphere is, it is thought, ionized during the day by the violet and ultraviolet rays of the sun, but through the night toward morning there are fewer free ions in the atmosphere, and so the Hertzian waves of the sun do not readily excite luminescence in the atmosphere at that time. The number and intensity of auroras, therefore, ought to be greatest in the early hours of the evening and decrease toward morning.

"ON THE HIRING LINE"

Not had, that title, for the play at the Alcazar. In these days, when labor is mysteriously short and the house-working class has taken to itself wings and flown away, we all know how it is ourselves. We are all wailing for house servants; and, by the way, if those who were formerly servants, or are now, or ever shall be, demand that we cease calling them by that appellation, we will willingly give it up; "oh, most content and cheerful." This is the time for them to strike for that change, for in such matters the world is in a conceding mood. And besides, we have heard echoes, not yet materialized into articulate sound, that seemed to intimate the evolution of a new order of intelligent, organized domestic workers, of superior ability to those that such of us as can not afford the highly trained servants of the rich are used to. So far the experiment, begun in New York under the auspices of the Y. W. C. A., seems to have made no noise in the world, that element of the situation being principally contributed by wailing householders, who pine for the routine of pre-war life.

Alas, that golden age will never come back; not in our time, at least, which is never to us.

The situation has both its tragic and its comic side; tragic, because there are worn and weary women trying to do all the cooking and housecleaning in their households, besides nursing some disabled member of the household; a paralyzed octogenarian, or perhaps taking care of a quiverful of children with the measles.

And people starving in Europe and Asia. How topsy-turvy and unreasonable the whole condition seems.

To be sure, there is a rumor—perhaps wild and baseless—that certain laws, rules, or regulations are to be suspended in order to get over here one hundred thousand of the destitute women of Austria who are threatened with starvation if they stay, poor souls, in their lighted country. But if they come those one hundred thousand will be absorbed as quickly as the morning dew by the summer sun.

There's just one good thing out of it all. We are all learning by practice a good many things that we formerly knew by theory only. No more can the haughty person in the kitchen put it over us as to how long it takes to cook string beans, or just how one contrives an unumpy white sauce. Oh, we're learning lots of things; how to live the simple life, for one; the superior economy gained by dispensing with a servant and a servant's waste, for another. Also, some women find they like to do the cooking. And the money saved thereby justifies occasional downtown dinner jamborees for the whole family.

And there's still another result. Take note, oh young womanhood, for it may influence you in your choice of a husband! Did you know that lots of young men, unable or unwilling to pay the prices ordinarily charged for board since the h. c. l. reared its fell head, have taken to living in apartments and doing, not only their own cooking, but their own housework? Some of them, probably, do it badly, but the intelligent ones are not going to put up with ruining good food material at prevailing prices by had cooking. Any one who does that sort of thing nowadays for other people's consumption ought to be put in the stocks. For food is going higher, since the farmer, incensed at the unreasonableness of the industrial workers, has concluded he will no longer be the goat. The farmer has jumped his job in the Eastern industrial sections, and has gone to work in the factories at high wages such as his farming profits never dared to touch. And food commodities are going to soar. Just you wait until next winter!

To return to the male housekeeper, I was told by a census worker that she saw repeatedly, in households where she was collecting her data, the man of the house caring for a sick wife, dressing the children, washing, cooking, and ironing.

Why do people hate cooking so? Partly, I think, because they are shut up in a dull kitchen, partly because it is so messy, and partly because it is so monotonous. I think the monotony of the task might be broken up by the women, or the men, if it is a masculine establishment, doing K. P. week about. And then, in milder climates than ours, they will be obliged, if this new order of things keeps up, to have pleasant kitchen porches, which the family will not avoid if they are vine-covered, or made attractive with potted plants. There the cook of the week can enjoy the calm joys of social intercourse with members of her family engaged on other tasks while she shells the peas, or chases the water-drops off the lettuce's crisp hack, or contrives the succulent mayonnaise.

But this is a dream. Real estate, like everything else, is disgustingly high—although equally disgustingly difficult to sell—and rear porches big enough to be pleasant require increased expenditure and increased work. So let's tackle our job with what cheer we may.

"On the Hiring Line" is a comedy verging on farce, in which the servant problem is treated in a jocular spirit. It is by Harvey O'Higgins—expert in plays and short stories—and Harriet Ford, these two tried and tested collaborators having hit the hull's-eye in New York with this play, because it is bright, amusing, timely, and because the authors have the kind of taste that prefers humor presented with verisimilitude. It's the way I prefer humor myself, usually, and above all I do like to see authors who are presenting the purely comic able to do so without resorting to acrobatic humor.

"On the Hiring Line," therefore, presents a group of people in a domestic entourage, which we always like. Then the wife has been an actress; which seems to involve interesting possibilities. And the daughter is receiving constant proposals of marriage from the chauffeur; which is promising, to say the least. The husband is still in love with his wife, the wife still in love with her husband—which isn't as tame as it sounds—and they are all living in the country; which means a constant state of hurrah-hoys, as living in the country is conducive to many domestic excitements on a small scale; such as the brooding hen getting out of her coop, or the discovery that the hired man has vamoosed with the car when the family discover, at 1 o'clock in the morning, that they wanted to all huddle in and motor to the fire ten miles away, and find whether it is old man Smith's barn or young man Jones' new nest for his bridal birdie.

So excitements range all through "On the Hiring Line," which is a well-built comedy—or farce-comedy; take your choice—well constructed, with good situations, witty dialogue, and a double finale which tickles the ribs the way it meets the servant problem.

It was a real comfort to see the company able to walk instead of gallop through the play. I didn't see a single leap over the furniture, and though there was a pursuit it was neither unduly lengthened nor unduly exaggerated.

I think the company, which appeared to advantage in the play, enjoyed themselves thoroughly; more especially as nobody had to get under the hed or climb through a tansom; and still more especially because the lines of the play were received with constant hursts of laughter.

THE ORPHEUM.

There are various signs at the Orpheum of the change in the personnel of the Orpheum staff, which seems to carry with it an intention to freshen up the interior. There is a gorgeously embroidered screen at the central ticket-entrance, and even while the programme was in progress at the day performances this week an artist was busy on the other side of a huge canvas ceiling-screen, the which greatly stimulated our curiosity as to what we shall see when the screen is removed. Furthermore the new régime is going to wage a righteous war against the ticket speculators, for after each printed number on the programme appears a line warning the public against believing the ticket speculator who says there are no tickets to be had at the box-office.

This week's bill is extra good, both in quality and variety. "Kiss Me," a musical-comedy act, Louise Dresser and Jack Gardner in songs, Elsa Ryan in "Peg—For Short" are the headliners. But there are several other acts that, if their performers had not such popular names in vaudeville to contend against, might easily rank as headliners.

For instance, the extraordinary jumping by "Mrs. Clinton's husband" is one of the neatest, most airily perfect demonstrations of its kind we are apt to see in vaudeville. The jumper is as light and sure in his movements as the flight of a bird to a hough, the whole performance showing constant and untiring practice by an athlete with unusual balance and muscular resilience.

Palo and Palet, "Les Bouffons Musicals," give a particularly melodious act, beginning with performances on that vaudeville contraption with a keyboard that is more like an accordion than anything else and tapering off with a variety of unnamed brass instruments that were played with great skill. I rather took it for granted that the youth was the son of the sad-eyed senior, and—was it my romantic imagination, or did not the music played by the son reflect the lightsome moods of youth, while that of the elder seemed to supply the element of sorrow and sadness that youth has scarcely had time to live through and feel? It seemed to me that the operatic and popular selections were particularly well chosen, and that the handsome clown costumes and the odd background gave a pleasingly foreign suggestion to the whole act that seemed to be in some degree borne out by the countenances of the two performers.

This is a week for the display of ladies' tresses. I use the expression tresses, as distinctive from plain hair, because of the gorgeous display made by the ladies in this particular. Clara Morton lavishly exhibited, not only a plump and saucy pair of pantaletted—to the knee—legs, but a fine suit of dark hair which manifestly grew on her scalp and flowed down her back in curls. Curls also were displayed by Katherine Parker in a well-played darkly impersonation act in which Harrison Greene was so much the darky to the life that arguing members of the audience were relieved when, at the end of the act, he removed his cap and showed the line of demarcation between white skin and black. Elsa Ryan showed a bewildering confusion of blonde curliness, which made a charming frame to her beguiling countenance in "Peggy—For Short," a playlet in which the Irish drolleries of the comedienne and the stern misogamy of the finally beguiled, conquered, and annexed male, as played by Rodney Ramous, were the prominent features.

There was a very considerable thatch mixed in with the vamp head-dress of Dorothea Sadlier in "Kiss Me," a taldoid musical comedy the story of which really captured our attention, so curious did we become as to how Bohhie was going to untangle himself from his wife imhroglio. And Margaret Evans had a perfect Niagara of store curls on the top of an already copiously endowed head. And—let

A Prevalent Cause of Waste

From letters sent out recently by our Service Department we extract these passages:

"The rubber ball in the tank of the toilet, which should close the vent of the toilet after each flush, does not always make exact contact, and waste of water follows."

"The hall-cock in the toilet tank is defective, and registration of water is in excess of actual demand."

"Few plumbers adjust the water supply in toilet tanks with regard to variation in pressure, overlooking the fact that there is continual fluctuation in demand. A margin should be allowed for increased pressure; when it is not, water may be expected to overflow into the sewer."

These extracts deal with a widely prevalent cause of water waste, namely, toilet leakage.

If your bill jumps, and your faucets are tight, have the toilet examined.

The chances are that the water is wasting there.

If you desire, our Service Department will make the examination and tell you what repairs you need.

We have to bill by meter registration, but it affords us no pleasure to collect for wasted water.

"Piedmont Estates" Homesites

— IN —

The East Bay's Finest Residential Park

IN BEAUTIFUL PIEDMONT, commanding a most magnificent view of San Francisco Bay and the Marin County hills.

THIS SUPERB residential Park is situated on the Sunkist slope of the Fashionable Piedmont District and is absolutely protected from disagreeable winds.

THIS PARK has been subdivided so the contours of the land give each homesite a natural setting. This will appeal to appreciative people, who desire something different from the ordinary flat level land without inspiration or artistic merit.

ONLY FIFTEEN of these remarkable homesites of from one to four acres; each one furnishing a most picturesque location for a home of dignity and refinement.

CAREFULLY RESTRICTED to home costing from $10,000 upward.

THIS UNIQUE LOCATION, the splendid plans prepared for the development of this beautiful residential Park, prepared by landscape Engineers of note, and the perfect building restrictions combine to make this a home place of distinctiveness and individuality.

us he fair, since we're mentioning hair endowments—Mrs. Clinton's husband's wife had no slouch of a brown chevelure soaring above her English countenance.

These ladies, however, were able to do livelier things than merely display hair. Margaret Evans isn't much on singing, but she carries her clothes with style and has a nice little twittering personality, although it took a back seat compared to that of Dorothea Sadlier. This actress, who played the vamp in "Kiss Me," has melodramatic eyes, a deep-toned voice, and a fount of energy that causes her to put in her best licks in her slightest saying and least gesture. She was quite an important element in the fun of "Kiss Me," Harry Meyer playing, in lively style, the rôle of a loquacious schemer who is looking for a fake wife so as to capture Aunt Julia's boodle.

Clara Morton cracks jokes, sings jolly songs, and displays a variety of costumes—not to mention a pair of short, plump, pattering legs.

Louise Dresser—whose neat blonde tresses seemed to reproach the tumbled profusion of Elsa Ryan's and the vamp's—joined with Jack Gardner in a sort of alphabetical song competition which revealed an agreeable personality and refined treatment on the lady's part, and a light comedy style on the gentleman's, which kept the audience looking for the next ditty like interested and amused children.

A trained monkey act, conducted by a woman trainer, Anita Diaz by name, who affected to carry on whispered colloquies with her submissive charges and allowed some of them more liberty from their leashes than is usual in animal acts, pleased that element to whom animal shows particularly appeal. The trainer knows her business, and the little brutes, so almost mournful in their grotesque ugliness, did all their stunts with obedient precision.

It will be perceived that there is quite a variety of entertainment on the bill of the week, and as there is a very showy chorus in "Kiss Me," including the novelty of a gorgeously costumed, semi-historical "vamp" parade, the pursuer of vaudeville joys was not much left to wish for.

POWDERING THE NOSE.

She was a pretty thing; yes, although she was engaging in the act of abstracting, with milk-white teeth, a generous crescent from an apple pie. Suddenly a thought seemed to strike her. Out came—yes, right in the midst of her repast—her vanity bag. And she powdered a charming nose.

And we see them doing it everywhere. At the theatre, between acts; sometimes even when the hounds of the drama are in full cry on the stage. The stenographers do it at their desks; or sometimes as they walk up Market Street. The girls calmly glide their puffs over their noses at the end of a dance, as they exchange persiflage with their partners.

And then, the spectacle of a middle-aged woman obtruding her toilet operations on the public eye, what of the good taste? Quite putting aside the question of dignity, is it the act of a lady? And if the elders are not going to furnish standards for the young, who is? And if it is allowable to powder one's complexion, why not paint it, equally, under the public eye? Why not adjust false teeth and re-pack those astonishing ear-bags that hang heavily over the ears?

To be sure there is the question of vanity involved. Does a pretty young woman want to admit that her bloom is not natural, her teeth all there, and her hair as nature made it? Certainly not, although some of the more advanced spirits do use their lip-sticks in public.

The presumption is that women think that men do not criticize them for making up in public. But they do. I have seen a whole row of men at the theatre deriding, among themselves, the performances of a charmingly pretty girl studying her face absorbedly in a portable mirror, and touching it up lovingly with powder and rouge.

The trouble is the girls have too much nerve since the era of public semi-nudity has come in. It is the easiest thing in the world to shed modesty, which seems to be a plant of purely artificial growth. Many people think that the free unveiling of their charms by girls—and the middle-aged, and, yes, sometimes the old—is due to a vulgar desire freely to exhibit their physical advantages. There is, however, a certain quality of literalness in many women which, once a style is a style, causes them to enthrone it in sanctity. A style is made to be followed. Therefore they powder their noses in public—since all stylish girls do—nonchalantly reveal their backs to the waist-line, and their fronts as far down as the law allows. Have you ever smiled in amusement at the abrupt slant made by the top line of an evening bodice when it passes under the arms and shoots down to the back belt? It is to laugh—or, preferably, for the judicious to grieve.

Every time a girl powders in public or bares her back to the general gaze she makes a confession of personal vanity. But she seems to care not a whit.

And the men don't like it, at least not in their own womankind, or in girls they admire and would woo. It subtracts from the divinity of their divinities.

The girls say, "I should worry." But why shouldn't they worry? Isn't it abnormal not to care. The real, normal, human, lovable girl will always care. Wasn't she put on this earth to care, to value the opinion of her man, and to love him and the children she bears him?

Oh, girls, you geese! Why don't you let the poor fellows have some occasion for keeping up the worshipping attitude? It doesn't last, of course, but it is a pleasant feature of life for the young of both sexes. And if you don't get your share of it as a girl, mark my words, you'll never get it at all.

JOSEPHINE HART PHELPS.

Using the Useless.

What to do with the immense amount of furnace slag that accumulates in the iron foundries was successfully solved some time ago by an English concern, which has converted this slag into paving flags, paving tiles, bricks, etc.

The process of making the paving flags is about as follows: The slag is carried to a crusher having a capacity of about one hundred tons daily, where it is broken up and then taken to screens, where it is graded, the coarse being run into cars to be used as ballast and the rest subjected to further crushing. The excess dust is removed by screening and used for the manufacture of tiles.

The slag suitable for paving flags is mixed in a dry state with a cement-like material and then water is added and the whole thoroughly incorporated. A pressure of four hundred tons is exercised upon this mixture by a hydraulic press and all the moisture is forced out, leaving a hard, dense block of uniform character.

A different cementing material is employed in making tiles from the dust, the effect being to give the mixture a certain amount of plasticity which allows it to be moulded by mechanical means and permits it setting into a dense mass. If rapidity of production is desired the action of setting can be accelerated by artificial means and the goods made ready for use within twenty-four hours. The addition of coloring matter allows the construction of building blocks of various hues. Experience with these slag materials shows that exposure to cold and frost has no effect except to produce a greater hardness in the material.

We have noticed (says Christopher Morley in the New York Evening Post) with great satisfaction that there is a lot of good sense going the rounds in regard to Anglo-American relations. It is partly due to the delightful good sense and personal charm of some of the English and Irishmen who have been visiting this country in the past year or so. Men like Galsworthy, Philip Gibbs, Hugh Walpole, Drinkwater, Lord Dunsany, St. John Ervine, Sassoon, Massingham. Shorter, Ernest Barker return to England carrying with them the warm affection of those with whom they have associated over here. They have shown an almost embarrassing readiness to be enthusiastic about what they have seen. They have chafed us, we have chafed them, in the way that only friends can do. As for complete "understanding," we hope that will never come to pass, for it is the subtle differences in the English and American points of view that make transatlantic intercourse so agreeable. It is when we understand people thoroughly and completely that we begin to weary of them.

FOYER AND BOX-OFFICE.

The Columbia Theatre.

A fine musical entertainment is in store for the patrons of the Columbia Theatre Monday evening, July 19th. The attraction is "The Firefly," and in addition to the artists already included in the cast of the New Bostonians there is Mabel Riegelman, who has just joined the organization and makes her debut in the rôle of Nina.

Miss Riegelman is too well known to need introduction. She has long been associated with the Chicago and the Boston grand opera companies and recently completed a long and successful tour. She has never played Nina previously, but is well suited to the rôle.

Other notable in the cast are J. Humbird Duffey, Lavinia Winn, Edward Quinn, Leslie Leigh, Detmar Poppin, Marie Horgan, Sam A. Burton, and Dorothy Elton. The feature numbers of the piece are "A Beautiful Ship from Toyland," "Sympathy," "Giannina Mia," and "Love Is Like a Firefly." Matinees Wednesday and Saturday.

The Curran Theatre.

Charlotte Greenwood, who is attracting capacity houses in Oliver Morosco's latest musical-comedy hit, "Linger Longer Letty," will begin her last two weeks at the Curran Theatre next Sunday night, July 18th. She has made a big personal hit as a sort of Cinderella who rises from the kitchen to the drawing-room. Miss Greenwood is unique in her fun-making and she is irresistible.

She is surrounded by a capable cast and a snappy chorus. Robert Higgins lends great support to the entertaining qualities of the performance. Harry James conducts the orchestra.

The Alcazar Theatre.

"Peg o' My Heart" has been secured by the Alcazar for its last and only week on the San Francisco stage, beginning at next Sunday's matinee. "Peg o' My Heart," since the famous two years in New York, has smashed box-office records in every American city, large and small. So phenomenal a success has been unequalled in the history of the stage. It is one of those rare comedies that one never tires of seeing. Inez Ragan should be an ideal "Peg." Very interesting will be the special engagement of Emelie Melville in the grand dame rôle, which she created and played hundreds of times in the original New York production of "Peg."

"A Tailor Made Man," another popular success, will follow on Sunday, July 25th.

The Orpheum.

Special interest attaches to the Orpheum bill which opens Sunday. Irene Franklin is singing her own songs, each of which give her the opportunity to bring to the stage some character made familiar to every one by daily association. Percy Bronson and Winnie Baldwin will return with their new act, which has scored a triumphant trip over the entire Orpheum Circuit. The story deals plenty of laughter through the possibilities of a quart of a forbidden liquid which escaped the attention of prohibition officers until it is uncorked in 1970. Louise Dresser and Jack Gardner, musical-comedy stars with an individual song cycle, are holdovers from the preceding week. These two artists will assist materially in maintaining the high altitude of the new bill. "Creole Fashion Plate" will delineate song and fashion. Val and Ernie Stanton, "English Boys from America"; "The Man Off the Ice Wagon," a recently discovered iceman who possesses a marvelous voice; Three Danoise Sisters, a triangle of beauty, grace, and agility; and Chong and Rosie Moey, with their Oriental version of American songs and dances, are other new acts. Topics of the day, news events, and the Orpheum orchestra are other attractions.

AMERICA HAD BIGGEST ANIMALS.

Stealing a dinosaur sounds about as feasible as walking off the Brooklyn Bridge, but dispatches from Buenos Ayres tell of an expedition recently sent to Patagonia to study a mammoth specimen discovered a year ago, and found it missing!

"Today we must go to Africa for the biggest game, but there was a time in the dim, distant past when America produced animals larger than any now living," says a communication to the National Geographic Society by Barnum Brown.

"That was so long ago that nothing remains of these creatures except their bones, and they are turned to stone. Hidden away under strata of earth, their spoor has long since grown cold.

"The animals are dinosaurs; for the moment we will call them lizards—not the creeping, crawling kind, but huge reptiles that stalked upright through the jungles, rivaling in size the elephant, the hippopotamus, and the rhinoceros.

"In the marshes of prehistoric times dwelt a host of reptiles, some large, some small, and of various forms, flesh eaters and herb eaters, but all sharing certain characters in common and known as dinosaurs. Not any were closely related to any living reptile, yet they had some characters common to the lizards, crocodiles, and birds.

"Of the kinds characteristic of the period one species, a herb eater named Trachodon, was more than thirty feet long and about fifteen feet high when standing erect. Its head, with broadly expanded mouth, resembled that of a duck, but back of the beak there were more than two thousand small teeth, disposed in many vertical rows, each containing several individual teeth, the new ones coming up from below as the old ones wore out.

"The long hind feet terminated in three large-hoofed toes, and the shorter, slender front feet were partially webbed. A long, thin, slender tail acted as a powerful swimming organ, and the body was covered with rough tuberculate skin. Having no means of defense, it lived chiefly in the water, where it was free from attacks of the flesh eaters.

"With the 'duck-billed' Trachodon there were other large closely related forms inhabiting the water. Saurolophus was similar in build, but characterized by a large crest extending above the skull, and pelvic bones that were developed for attachment of powerful tail muscles. It was probably a distinctly aquatic type.

"Along the shores lived Ornithomimus, the bird mimic, as the name implies, one of the most remarkable of the dinosaurs. A skeleton found last year shows it to have been a toothless creature, the jaws sheathed like the beak of a bird."

The restoration of the Louvain Library has been commenced by the German government. Many valuable paintings and books which were carried to Germany are now being returned under the compulsory terms of the peace treaty.

VANITY FAIR.

Among the things that one would rather not have said we may include Mr. McAdoo's assertion that he could not afford to be President. One must provide for one's family, said Mr. McAdoo in effect, and this could hardly be done on a salary of $75,000 a year and an allowance of $25,000 a year for traveling expenses. The cost of living, as we all know, is high. Sugar is 30 cents a pound or thereabouts, and the hoot and shoe bill for the youngsters is something staggering. Mr. McAdoo did not actually enter on these domestic details, but doubtless they arrayed themselves at the back of his frugal mind. He felt himself compelled to seek more remunerative employment. Perhaps he remembered the Scriptural warning that he who provides not for his own family is worse than a heathen.

None the less Mr. McAdoo probably wishes that he had not said this. It grates a little. Every one knows, of course, that a President must live and pay his bills, and that he must have money to do it with. There need be no false modesty about that. But delicacy, not to speak of patriotism, seems to suggest that the presidential office and the presidential salary be kept in separate mental compartments, so to speak. There is something a little repugnant in the conception of the presidency as a means of getting one's living, as a kind of "job," to be accepted or rejected in the light of its financial merits. Why not stipulate also for an eight-hour day and overtime and accident insurance? It is almost as though General Joffre had refused to fight the battle of the Marne without an increase of pay, or had declined to fight at all because of the high cost of living. It is just one of the things that are not done. One can not quite say why. It is a matter of instinct. Either one has it or not. Voila tout.

But the salary of the President is actually a very sufficient one. If the White House were a private home it would be insufficient. It would probably tax an economist to "run" it in its present style on an income of $75,000 a year. But the main expenses of the White House are not paid by the President. The only demands that are made on his private pocket are for the food eaten by himself, his family, and his few personal servants; the salaries of his personal servants, and the family clothes. There is practically nothing else. He is vastly better off financially than the private citizen who has the same salary.

To begin with he has no rent to pay, nor interest on rental values. Repairs do not concern him at all. They are all done at the cost of the nation. The nation provides all the furnishings of the White House, all decorations, and all replenishings.

All the servants, except some half-dozen, are paid by the government. The large staff that is ordinarily in evidence is no concern of the President. He has his own cook and a few maids who look after the personal needs of the presidential family, and these are paid from the President's private funds. But no others. His automobiles and carriages cost him nothing. He need not worry about the price of gasoline or the expensiveness of tires. No one need worry about these things except the taxpayer, and he has other and more intimate worries of his own. The President himself pays no taxes. Not only is he furnished with an automobile and carriages, but also with a sumptuous yacht, and if these means of transportation should prove inadequate there is the allowance of $25,000 a year for traveling expenses.

There are a dozen other items that must be met by the private citizen but that are spared to the President. For example, every place of amusement is open to him without charge. The theatres in Washington have their presidential boxes perpetually at his service, and all he has to do is to signify his intention to occupy them. He pays no club dues, for every club in the country is open to him. When all these factors are duly considered it will be seen that the presidential salary is actually a very reasonable one and implies a financial ease far greater than that enjoyed by the private citizen whose income is nominally the same. Indeed the New York Times quotes a former secretary to a President to the effect that $50,000 a year can easily be saved out of the salary and the traveling allowance.

It is fortunate in more ways than one that Mr. McAdoo will not now be called upon to make the financial sacrifice incidental to the presidential office. It must be a relief to his mind to know that he may still hold himself open to whatever offers may come his way, and so to provide for his family in a way worthy of their exalted status. He can hardly say with Julius Caesar that thrice was he offered a kingly crown and he did thrice refuse it. But in the years to come, when the kindly waters of time have effaced some of the ripples on the sands of current events, he may perhaps make some airy references in the seclusion of his home to the little presidential job that once came his way and that he was compelled to "turn down" because it was not quite "good enough."

There is something a little pathetic in the plight of some of the former guests of the old Manhattan Hotel in New York, now closed in deference to the spirit of the new age, which demands office buildings in the place of hostilities. Many of these guests have lived at the Manhattan Hotel for years. It was their permanent home and they never supposed that they would have to seek another. They took up their abode at the Manhattan long before there were even rumors of a scarcity of accommodation in flats and apartment houses. They read of such things in the vague and incurious way of those who were not personally interested, just as we read of the cholera in Thibet or a flood in China. And now they suddenly find themselves cast forth on an overcrowded world, and a very indifferent world, and they do not know where to lay their heads. More than a hundred families were thus evicted, and a good many of them are still wandering about from one temporary habitation to another and with their confidence in the stability of things pretty badly shaken. In a way these poor people are typical of humanity at large. We are all more or less wrenched from the moorings that we thought were so firm, and maybe there is a good deal of drifting ahead of us.

Three resident hotels have gone out of business during the past year—the Holland House, the Knickerbocker, and now the Manhattan. The Knickerbocker catered mainly to the theatrical crowd. Caruso lived there for years. He was married from there and his daughter was born there. President Wilson used to stay there a good deal when he was governor of New Jersey, and Admiral Togo's name is to be found in its visitor's book.

President Wilson stayed also at the Manhattan and President McKinley made it his New York home. Theodore Roosevelt directed his Progressive campaign from the Manhattan, and there were other Presidents and celebrities of lesser rank who were familiar figures in its precincts.

The Manhattan was the ne plus ultra of respectability. High school girls were allowed to go to the Manhattan without a chaperon, and at a time when chaperons had very real duties to perform. And now at last it falls from its high estate. No wonder there should be consternation and the shaking of conservative heads.

JOKES AT ROYAL EXPENSE.

Thomas Carlyle observed that "kings are ill to joke with," but there have nevertheless been plenty of jokers so audacious as to "josh" kings with a well-developed sense of humor, such as Charles II, capable of enjoying a sally at their own expense (declares a writer in the Philadelphia Public Ledger).

It is related that one day when Charles was inspecting a warship at Catham he asked Killigrew, "Don't you think that I should have made a good shipwright?" Charles was proud of his reputed skill in naval architecture, and, no doubt, by this query sought a compliment. But Killigrew, who was nothing of a courtier, replied instead:

"I have always thought that your majesty would do better at any trade than your own."

A lively example of French retort to royalty is afforded by the story of Marshal Bassompierre and Louis XIII. The marshal had given his majesty an account of his embassy to Spain, setting forth the manner in which he had entered the Spanish capital mounted on a mule. "An ass seated on a mule!" exclaimed Louis, with a laugh. "Yes, sire," replied the marshal, "and the joke of it was I represented you!"

Good old Queen Bess, it appears, had a pretty wit, which she was by no means loth to exercise upon her subjects. In one verbal duel, at least, Elizabeth got the worst of it. Observing in the garden a courtier to whom she had promised promotion that had not materialized, her majesty thrust her head out of the window and called to him:

"What does a man think of, Sir Edward, when he thinks of me?"

"Of a woman's promise, your majesty," was Edward's response.

Among the neatest retorts to royalty whereof we have record was that alleged to have been made to the Prince of Wales, afterward King William IV, by the secretary of the admiralty.

Now, William had been hantering the secretary for some time at table. "When I am king," said he, "you shall not be secretary of the admiralty. What do you say to that?"

"God save the king!" rejoined the witty secretary.

Charles II once asked his chaplain, Dr. Stillingfleet: "How is it that you always read your sermons before me, when, as I understand, you can preach eloquently elsewhere without hook or notes?"

The good doctor answered that he was so overwhelmed by his majesty's presence that he could not trust himself otherwise, continuing: "And now, sire, may it please you to tell me why you read your speeches when you have no such excuse?"

When Charles, meeting Rochester one day, accosted him thus, "I believe thou art the wickedest fellow in my dominions," the witty nobleman immediately made answer:

"For a subject, sir, I really think I am."

Almost as disconcerting an answer was once given Frederick the Great, who, wishing to humiliate his physician, asked: "How many men, my doctor, have you sent into the other world?"

"Not nearly so many as your majesty," was the retort, "but with infinitely less glory."

When George III first met Sir John Irwin, a thirsty soul, he remarked facetiously: "They tell me, Sir John, you're fond of a glass of wine."

"Your majesty," gravely responded the courtier, "your informants do me a great injustice. They should have said a bottle."

In the early Christian era butter was regarded merely as a medicine, while among the Romans the use of butter proved the distinguishing mark between the rich and the poor.

Perhaps those overall clubs are being formed so a salaried man can disguise himself like a wage-earner and not be looked down upon.

STORYETTES.

Grave and Gay, Epigrammatic and Otherwise.

Mrs. Edwin was showing Selma, the new Swedish maid, "the ropes." "This," she said, "is my son's room. He is in Yale." "Ya?" Selma's face lit up with sympathetic understanding. "My brudder hane there, too." "Is that so? What year?" asked Mrs. Edwin, somewhat surprised. "Ach, he bane got no year; the judge yust say, 'You, Axel, sixty days in yail.'"

The conversation around the long dinner-table ended, as do most conversations nowadays, with the subject of spiritualism. The guests and the members of the family gave their opinions as to whether or not the dead could communicate with the living, but it remained for "Sweet Sixteen" to present the only original thought on the subject. "It's hard enough now for me to keep up my correspondence," she said. "When I die I want a rest."

Aunt Mary was very strict—too strict for Eric and his little sister, who were fed up with staying with her. She certainly tried her best to amuse them, and one morning took them to the zoo. But it was a failure. "Eric, keep away from that cage! Molly, your hat's crooked! Those seats are dirty, Eric—keep off them. If you hite the finger of your glove again, Molly, I shall take you straight home!" It was like a never-ending gramophone record on good behavior, and Aunt Mary never seemed to tire. At last the little party paused before a cage, and Aunt Mary consulted her catalogue. "This, children," she announced, "is an ant-eater." Eric looked cautiously round as he whispered to Molly: "Can't we push her in?"

Recently a small farmer in Honduras called at a city drug store and asked for some poison with which to kill wild animals that were destroying his poultry. On being informed that no poison could be sold without a personal recommendation from the mayor of the town, he went in search of that functionary and soon returned with the following note: "Please give Mr. W—a little poison, as he is an honest man." The note was signed by the mayor.

Mr. A is a very enthusiastic lodge man, spending about five nights out of every seven at various lodge-rooms—all of which lodges he is a member. His wife, who is rather tolerant of the whole business, however does occasionally get peeved enough to say a few sarcastic things. And the other night came her chance. For a wonder her husband was at home for an evening, curled up in a rocking-chair before the grate fire she had made and reading very busily. For a long time she sat silent watching him, then she asked, "John, what are you reading?" "My ritual," he answered. "Well, I must say," she remarked with some spirit, "if you had studied your marriage vows as much as you have studied that ritual you would be a model husband."

"Now, boys," said the schoolmaster, "I want you to bear in mind that the word 'stan' at the end of a word means 'the place of.' Thus we have Afghanistan—the place of the Afghans; also Hindustan—the place of the Hindus. Can any one give me another example?" Nobody appeared very anxious to do so, until little Johnny Snaggs, the joy of his mother and the terror of the cats, said proudly: "Yes, sir, I can. Umbrellastan—the place for umbrellas."

A nervous neighbor returned from his first driving lesson boasting of his easy mastery of the new car. To please him several of his family consented to ride with him, and things went well until they reached a good country road, when a car coming up behind them honked its horn. The startled driver jerked his wheel to the right, running down a steep bank, then to the left, heading into a fence, and to the right again, luckily bringing up in the road. "Dad, what in thunder are you trying to do?" demanded his breathless son. "Why, son," replied the new driver calmly, "I was just practicing to turn out for teams."

A number of English officers were sitting in a German restaurant in Cologne having a very good time for people who were away from home. They were struck by a rather lively conversation between the leader of the orchestra and several of its members. All of a sudden the orchestra began to play "Die Wacht am Rhein." Every one rose to his feet, while the officers, including the English, stood at attention, until the last note had been played. The leader was so surprised that he came down to the English officers and began the following conversation: "Gentlemen, may I ask you a question?" "Go ahead!" "Did you recognize the piece we just played?" "Sure!" "Do you know that was 'Die Wacht am Rhein'?" "Why, certainly," said one of the Englishmen, raising his voice so as to be heard all over the hall; "hut that's all right. Die Wacht am Rhein—that's us."

THE MERRY MUSE.

Gentle Query of a Disciple of Izaak Walton.

Along about this time of year
I think of waters brown and clear,
And mossy banks where one can sit
And watch the restless shadows flit,
And listen to the swishing
Of halmy breezes in the boughs
And lazily relax and drowse,
While in the ripples trails the line
To coax the speckled trout to dine—
I want to go a-fishing!

I have a book of silken flies
To tempt the wariest finny prize.
I have a nifty rod and reel,
And new, capacious willow creel—
But what's the use of wishing?
The sportive perch and red fin may
All unmolested leap and play,
The sunfish in the shallows bask.
Without the old-time pocket flask
How can I go a-fishing?
—Minna Irving in New York Times.

A Modern Sonnet.

Clorinda, you're the girl for me!
I caught you Tuesday darning hose,
And even the dullest eye can see
Neat patches on your last year's clothes!
Your shoe-black hat, home-laundered blouse,
Your gloves with well-linked finger-tips,
Your careful ways about the house,
Bring praises to a lover's lips.

I picture some safe inglenook,
A kitchenette, with you the qucen.
I've heard you say you love to cook
The costly spud, the humble bean.
I've learned how simple are your tastes—
You're mindful of a poor clerk's purse;
Scorn her who coin on candy wastes—
Vow ices had and lobster worse!

Ah, my Clorinda, heed these rhymes
Of one whose love will e'er prove true—
Who, in these fearsome, high-price times,
A treasure, girlie, sees in you!
Applied Domestic Science, pet,
Your household platform's chiefest plank;
Out of the salary I get
Each week a dime we ought to hank!
—Ella A. Fanning in New York Herald.

Victoria and Albert Docks

A writer to the London Times describes the Victoria and Albert docks at Tilbury as being "crowded to their fullest capacity with big ships," many of which "look absolutely dead for the simple reason that they can not be unloaded because there is nowhere to put their cargoes." Of ships carrying Australian meat it is said to be "a common thing to wait anything up to a month for a berth and to lie another month tied up against the wharf, unloading and reloading." Inefficiency of labor is in a large degree responsible, for the average discharging output per shift of thirteen men in a nine-hour day has been reduced from 100 to sixty-three tons. The cause is partly the loss of many good men in the war, partly loafing on the job to make work for as many men as possible. Congestion of the ports is attributed to state control over essential imports, to state control over railroads, and to reduction of the bours of labor. By these means the carrying power of ships has been reduced at least 30 per cent. below pre-war standards.

Notes and Gossip.

A chronicle of the social happenings during the past week in the cities on and around the Bay of San Francisco will be found in the following department:

Mr. and Mrs. Charles Rosenfelt of Portland have announced the engagement of their daughter, Miss Delphine Rosenfelt, and Mr. Robert Koshland, son of Mr. and Mrs. Marcus Koshland of San Francisco. The wedding will be an event of the late fall.

Commander William Van Antwerp entertained a number of friends at a dance last evening. The affair was held at the Burlingame Country Club.

Mrs. Templeton Crocker was a luncheon hostess Tuesday at her home in San Mateo.

Mr. and Mrs. Paul Verdier gave a dinner Wednesday evening in Burlingame, where they are established in the Marye house for the summer.

Mrs. William Hinckley Taylor entertained at luncheon a few days ago in compliment to Mrs. Haggin and Mrs. Patrick Calhoun. Among the guests were Mrs. Frederick Sharon, Mrs. James Keeney, Mrs. George Harding, Mrs. Dixwell Hewitt, Mrs. William Tevis, and Mrs. George Marye.

Miss Alice Keeler was the guest of honor at a tea given Wednesday by Mrs. Ralph Palmer in San Rafael. Those in the receiving party included Mrs. James Armshy, Mrs. Philip Brown, Mrs. Arthur Ford, Mrs. F. K. Pittmann, Mrs. Willard Wayman, Mrs. Charles Deems, Mrs. Alan Van Fleet, Mrs. Lloyd Hardie, Miss Marjorie Pittman, and Miss Katherine Pittman.

Mrs. Nion Tucker gave a children's party Tuesday in Burlingame to celebrate the birthdays of her little daughter, Miss Phyllis Anne Tucker, and Chase, Mr. and Mrs. George Howard, Mr. and Mrs. Hays Smith, Mr. Robert Burroughs, and Mr. Campbell Stewart.

Miss Frances Pringle entertained at luncheon on Tuesday, her guests having included Miss Jeanette Riley, Miss Adrienne Sharp, Miss Isabelle Bishop, Miss Edna Taylor, Miss Florence Russell, Miss Ynez Macdonald, and Miss Francesca Deering.

Mrs. Stuart Courtney entertained at luncheon last Wednesday in Montecito in compliment to Mrs. Eleanor Doe. The guests included Mrs. John Oliver, Mrs. G. C. Murphy, Mrs. Leigh Sypher, Mrs. John Page, Mrs. John Moore, Mrs. Lois Long, Mrs. George Coleman, Mrs. Joseph Fithian, Mrs. Arthur Ogilvy, Mrs. William Macdougall, Mrs. Seth Keeney, Mrs. R. L. Girvin, and Miss Alice Grimes.

Dr. and Mrs. Walter Boardman are being congratulated upon the birth of a daughter.

Mr. and Mrs. Harry Evans are being congratulated upon the birth of a son.

The Oldest Cities.

Archæologists have long remarked the absence of the name of the city of Damascus in the thousands of clay tablets of biblical and pre-biblical records already found by digging in the ruins of the East. Professor Albert T. Clay, curator of the Babylonian Collection at Yale University, says of this in his "Empire of the Amorites": "It could scarcely have been other than a city of the greatest [commercial and historical] importance in the earliest period of the world's history." There is an old Arabian saying that the first two cities to be rebuilt after the flood were Harran (Ammun) and Damascus, showing that both were known to the Arabians as very ancient cities.

Clay identifies Mash and Ki-Mash in numerous inscriptions found of the King Gudea and in the date formulae of the Ur dynasty as the ancient name of the city. "It is highly probable," he says, "that Mesnes in the Old Testament (Genesis 15:2) is the same, namely, Mashqi." Many years of laborious work over these cuneiform remains are often needed to identify localities and things as we know them, by their very ancient names. But Damascus is here placed as far back as 3000 B. C.

Aleppo, scene of Allenby's triumphs in 1918, is an ancient spot. Scholars have long considered Hallapi, also written Halman and Helma on the old bricks, as one with Aleppo.

Older than Damascus or Aleppo, however, is Amurru, capital of the land of the Amorites. This is a nearly forgotten people whose history is being slowly reconstructed by Professor Clay, older than the Hittites, data concerning whom was unearthed by Professor Sayce in the last century. The Amorites left no personal records, as far as the archæologists can determine, and "all the light that can be thrown upon the early history of the country (Amurru) is gathered from contemporary sources and inscriptions of a later period." At that the Yale man is making out a convincing case for the importance and antiquity of Amurru.

A Silly Tale.

There are very many silly tales in books concerning the old Franciscan Missions of California, but the silliest of them all is that one which is forever cropping up to the effect that many hundreds of thousands of dollars in gold were hoarded in these establishments.

One has only to ask one's self, Where did this huge store of money come from? California had little traffic with the outside world in the days of the missions. Hides and tallow were traded to Yankee ships for clothing and ornaments, but not for money. And gold had not yet been discovered here.

Next to Junipero Serra himself, the most respected figure in the early history of California is Padre Lasuen. Even Bancroft glows over Lasuen. Surely the word of this venerated man may be taken for truth.

When the King of Spain once sent to the California missions for money, Padre Lasuen answered the request as follows: "Inasmuch as the fathers are placed in poverty by their profession, and the Indian wards by their nature, I think that his majesty does not want of us a temporal offering. I am myself without even a stipend to which I am entitled, and the stipends that my brethren receive they turn over for the advancement of the missions."

Anything that purports to be history must be supported by the testimony of an authentic and reliable witness. And here we have the testimony unimpeachable of Padre Lasuen.

There are a lot of lying books that should be fed to bonfires.—Los Angeles Times.

"Speaking of hopeful dispositions, there's Mrs. Blobs." "What about Mrs. Blobs?" "She's bought a ouija board with the expectation of finding out where and how Blobs spends his evenings."—Birmingham Age-Herald.

CURRENT VERSE.

The Ape.

I yearned to romp and frolic,
I yearned to laugh and play,
I yearned to be a rover
Along the gipsy way,
And wander hithly singing
Forever and a day.

There was an ape that saw me.
"You are my slave!" he cried.
He seized my hands and hound them.
My dancing feet he tied.
"Oh, let me loose!" I pleaded.

Said he: "Have you no pride?"
I wailed: "Farewell to gladness!"
"Be thankful!" muttered he.
"Just think of what a scandal
If you escaped from me!
I'll hold you chained forever;
I am your Dignity!"

—Stanton A. Coblenz in New York Times.

Petunia.

When I have a daughter I shall name her Petunia:
Petunia, Petunia, I shall call her;
In the rooms of my house she shall dance, her small face

So bright that no sorrow'll befall her.
From this dark pot of earth, from this sun-clouded hollow

Like a rainbow she'll spring and a blue sky shall follow,
Green trees shall blow in and gay fountains of water

Ripple the voice of earth's last fairest daughter.
And I'll teach her the songs of Apollo.

The songs of Apollo that white-armed maidens
Sing in the soft dusks of summer,
In the gardens of Zante the sea-girt, the yellow,
Where the black and gold bees hum and clum-

mer;
Where the oranges glowing with sun-stolen fire
Lie in heaps for the galleys of Phocæ and Tyre;
Where, orbed in clear water, languidly lying
In green, shallow pools the mermaids, faint crying,
To the Sun in the gold West quire.

In the green of their eyes in the green of their tresses

The forests of ocean are blowing,
They glint with strange gleams of cold stone and of metal

Through the veins of the blind earth flowing;
Round those wavering, gold, orange-pyramids swimming,

The heading clear water their ivory breasts brimming,

They sing, and faint-floating the songs they sing
Through fields and cities and men's hearts ring,
The glory of martial life dimming.

From all small-mouth shells on the shining wet sands

A shadowy roar is fleeting.
The roar of great oceans chained fast to the Moon

From the shores of the dark world retreating:
And the maids who to bright Aphrodite cry
Hear naught but the ebb-tide faintly sigh
Far-off in the dusk, see dark tresses drifting
And the sudden-flashed gleam of white arms lifting
Dim hands in the sable sky.

Warm earth-maids in groups with arms white as the stars

On the edge of the solid world crying,
Their faint shadows trembling in cold, salt pools
Where the Moon at the bottom is lying,
Cry out to the weeds on the bright sea rocking—
The dark-bearded gods in their moon-ships rock-ing—

On the beach their white bodies in moon-vapor limned

Pale shadows on cliffs and on water dimmed,
To the bloom of the sea-foam flocking.

Aphrodite! Aphrodite; thou shalt touch and awake her,

She shall gaze on her body in wonder,
She shall bathe in thy foam, in her veins the great tide

Of the world beat its shadowy thunder.

All youth that, of old, lifted hand to the sky
By thine altars shall awaken, shall rise and cry
In her heart the song by all lovers begun—
As the ghosts of all flowers rise each year to the sun

From where their cold shapes lie.

And wrinkled and worn I shall gaze on her face
And worship the God there sleeping,
The ancient glory that flows up at dawn

Out of earth's darkness leaping,
I shall remember the beauty of water,
Of stillness, of lilies; in the face of my daughter
Youth's vanished loveliness I shall find;

The frosts of Winter thy hand shall unhind,
Petunia, Petunia, my daughter!

The dark walls will crumble, the hills glow re-lighted,

My spirit, that slumbering lover

Shall stare at the sky and once more and forever
The stars shall their beauty uncover.
The trees that droop crowding to see their dark limbs

When the dusk of that evening each clear image dims

In the lake of my soul shall quiver and gleam,
And depart—thou, too, Petunia—a Dream

As the earth fades out to its rims.
—From "The Dark Wind," by W. J. Turner.

The practice of giving numbers and letters instead of names to the streets and avenues of our cities is so familiar to us that it excites no thought, except of convenience. But it is a practice often remarked upon by foreigners as peculiar to the United States and as evidence of the matter-of-fact, unimaginative character of our people. Historical dates have been called picturesque names for streets. The French set the fashion in this respect. Paris has its Rue du 29 Juillet and its Rue du 9 Septembre. This fad has spread even to South America, Buenos Aires has its Parque 3 du Febrero, its July Promenade, its 16th of November Square, and also its 25th of May Street.

France is taking up seriously the problem of her 2,000,000 marriageable girls, who as a result of the war's losses can never hope to have husbands.

The Third Party.

The Third party has come to something like an ignominious end in Chicago. Based on a hatred of all existing political institutions and organizations, its component parts ended by hating one another. The Labor party would have nothing to do with the Non-Partisan League, and neither would have anything to do with the Single-Taxers or the American Constitutional party, which presumably is another name for Mr. Hearst.

The Third party was never taken very seriously by any one except by the rather dreary fanatics who composed it. There was no single tie to unite them except that of their respective inflammatory grievances and their malevolence toward the existing parties. The whole nation, we were asked to believe, is made up of dupes or knaves, with the exception of the forty-eight wise men, but who were not wise enough to draw up a platform or even to agree on any single tenet that should be equally acceptable to them all. It was ever the way with the rabid reformer. He can make quite an impressive showing so long as there is no necessity for combinations with others and so long as his work is purely destructive. He can not enter into combinations because he is too fanatically selfish, too much centered on his own particular grouch. And he can not turn his mind toward constructive work because his narrow vision hides from him everything except the smallest section of the political landscape.

But probably the forty-eight had a good time. They were able to utter their fiery protests, each one restrained by nothing more substantial than the impatient desire of his neighbor to talk about something else. Doubtless they all feel better after the general cursing in which they indulged, and if they will now keep silence for a while we may all agree that the occasion was a success.

America and Japan.

It is high time effort should be made to define the Japanese question in its true outlines and proportions as distinct from the distorted pictures presented by politicians and journalistic sensationalists. First, as to the idea that in time near or remote there is impending war between Japan and our own country: This notion has been exploited persistently for ten years or more, but with no real basis of justification. Nobody who knows the Japanese either from visitation in their country or through acquaintance with their leading men has ever for a moment regarded the prevalent "war talk" seriously. Assuredly we have no motives for war with Japan. And as little has Japan motives for war with us. Tradition and interest combine to incline the two countries to pacific relations; and we have never discovered a wish—much less a purpose—on the part of either to break a friendly connection that began with the entrance of Japan into the fraternity of nations and which has persisted until now.

War in its modern development is practically impossible between a small country and a large one. When combatants fought man to man or with small weapons it was the fighting front that counted, and oftentimes small nations by their spirit or skill were able to meet and overcome nations stronger in numbers. But today it is not so much what may be called the foreground of war as its background that must be reckoned with. Modern war is mainly an affair of engineering. It is impracticable without the support of industrial organization. We have only to glance at the relative material resources of the United States and Japan to see that war between the two countries is out of all reasonable calculation. It is conceivable that with her very considerable naval strength Japan might make a sudden and successful raid upon our Pacific Coast, just as a desperate man may run amuck anywhere. But the inevitable effect of such a movement would be fatal. In anything like war between the two countries our incalculable superiority in men and means would speedily make us victor. Nobody more truly appraises the dynamics of the situation than the statesmen of Japan. They know that they are safe in the pacific spirit of this country. They know that aggression on their part would end in disaster for Japan. We repeat that nothing is further from the wish or the intention of Japan than war with America.

There is but one conceivable condition under which the two countries might become involved in war and that is in connection with a possible alliance between Japan and some powerful European nation. And that is a contingency which need not in the present posture of world affairs disturb the serenity of anybody. Nobody may visualize the future. But for the present there is neither prospect nor possibility of effective combination between Japan and any European country looking to war with America. Whatever time may bring forth, this generation at least may shut both eyes and ears against rumor-mongers who talk of war with Japan.

The immediate issue in the relations between this country and Japan has reference to the fact that very considerable numbers of Japanese are finding their way into American territory and are seeking to establish themselves as owners of land and otherwise as permanent residents. Already the number of Japanese in our mid-Pacific territory of Hawaii outnumbers all other elements of the local population. In California there is a large and rapidly growing element of Japanese, and despite a certain diplomatic contract known as a "gentleman's agreement," under which Japanese laborers are nominally debarred from entrance into our country, they continue under one device or another to come. That they serve an economic purpose is conceded. The country is short at the point of labor and the Japanese now here supply a vital need. They are highly efficient in certain lines of work and they do not sell their labor cheap. Despite the outcry of the trade unionist and the politician, distinct economic benefits flow from the presence in California of the Japanese now here. If they came as did the Chinese a generation ago, only as workers and transient residents, there would in the present state of the labor market be no vital objection to them. But they do not come as transient workers. They come in numbers with the idea of remaining permanently in the country; and with that end in view, many are acquiring lands through purchase or lease and are establishing themselves as farmers and tradesmen. Here is the situation that has created, and justly we think, serious apprehension. Is it desirable or expedient that we should permit a race of men alien in blood, alien in mind and tradition, permanently unassimilable, to get definite footing in the country and so add another to our race problems?

There is a widely cherished theory that this country is a melting pot that takes in all manner of men and transmutes them into good Americans. Events in connection with the world war, and more recently with the Sinn Fein movement in Ireland, have to some extent shaken this conception; none the less it persists. But the truth is that despite the presumed efficiency of our melting pot it does not in practice yield the results claimed for it. As a matter of fact certain alien races have curiously maintained themselves in this country despite the public school, a common tongue, and other unifying influences and forces. Passing for the moment that great element marked off and held as a separate caste by the distinction of color, we may cite certain communities whose great-grandfathers were born in America, but which even to this day speak a foreign tongue. In Minnesota, in Nebraska, here in California, and in many other parts of the country there are whole communities of native-born Americans, yet wholly foreign in speech, domestic habits, national sympathies, and whatnot else differentiating them from the typical American. The very considerable number of foreign-language newspapers, alien religious organizations, and schools of alien instruction and inspiration bear witness to the persistence of racial types and of alien ideas. Every community which thus rejects and stands out against Americanizing influences is in the nature of things a source of political and social danger. Every unassimilated and unassimilable group is more or less a breeder of mischief. In ordinary times such communities, voting en bloc, are sold to the highest bidder, thus becoming a factor in the worst practices of our politics. We have recently seen how in the emergency of war alien sympathies may be transmuted into treason. If there had not been in this country large groups of Americans in name, but Germans in sympathy and spirit, much of our sacrifice in the war would have been saved, and the war itself brought to an end full two years prior to its actual close. It was the German element in America that made cowards of our administrative agents and so held back a participation that we owed to self-respect and humanity and which would have forced a conclusion of the great struggle full two years prior to the armistice.

When we see races and sects, presumably assimilable but practically unassimilated, we may well take stock of the hazard involved in permitting entrance into our country of individuals, and more especially groups, definitely marked off by the distinction of color. The status of the negro in America, with his growing menace to American life, sufficiently illustrates the case. Is it desirable or expedient to add to our negro problem—not to mention half a dozen other minor racial embarrassments—another problem in the shape of an Oriental problem? Verily, it is not. Already we have as many undigested and indigestible groups as we can carry without increasing hazards that we have no right to impose upon oncoming generations.

The very virtues of the Japanese lower orders who are flocking to this country becomes a powerful argument for their exclusion. Granted that they have the merits of industry, of temperance, of frugality, of thrift. These qualities, exercised in connection with low standards of living make the Japanese dangerous factors in the industrial life of the country. To meet their competition we should have to have a class similarly indifferent to the refinements of life. Our whole effort has been to develop higher standards and a better social order. We want here no class so devoted and inured, so restricted in its privileges and ambitions, that it may hold ground against groups of aliens like those that have intruded themselves upon various sections of the Sacramento Valley and are elbowing out of their homes old communities of American farmers. It is unthinkable that we should yield to an alien and unassimilable population seats of life and industry that we have reclaimed from the wilderness and established as centres of American life. And it is similarly unthinkable that we should wish or consent to such reductions in the standards of American life and industry as will hold considerable sections of our country against the competition of a low-grade alienism. The economic argument—the need for labor in industry—does not justify and can not be made to justify the importation of human elements whose competition must be fatal to the normal interests of normal American life.

None the less the methods by which opposition to the incoming Japanese is being sustained are unworthy, even deplorable. They are reflective rather of a sinister political aim rather than of sound moral purpose. Furthermore, they are calculated to destroy sympathy between our country and Japan, if not, indeed, to drive Japan to resentment, hatred, and possibly to calculations of reprisal. They are needlessly wounding the pride of a sensitive and ambitious people. We say needlessly because that which is being done offensively and in terms of insult might as easily be done graciously and without offense. It is both cruel and stupid to wound the "face" of Japan; and there is positive criminality in the employment of brutal means in promotion of personal and political aims. Japan has shown her willingness to deal with us in the matter under discussion upon even terms. That she will engage upon conditions mutual in all respects to restrain movement of her lower orders to this country is a demonstrated assurance. We have only to take the matter up in calm spirit and in terms of mutual respect to get from Japan any engagement that our interest requires. The national ambition of Japan does not look to conquest of any part of the United States by "peaceful penetration" or by any other method. The national aims of Japan relate to the Orient. She aspires to a character in relation to the eastern frontage upon the Pacific that we hold on our frontage. If we will yield to Japan a position in her part of the world similar to that which we hold under the Monroe Doctrine in our own she will be content, even grateful. And with due reservation in respect of our fixed obligation to China, there is no reason why we may not concede to Japan everything that her national spirit demands. In truth we have as little right to intrude upon Japan's natural sphere of influence as she has to intrude upon ours.

The political method of dealing with the Japanese problem—the method now in vogue at the hands of our politicians and social agitators—can only end in the substitution of ill-will and resentment for friendship and a proper coöperation. There is imperatively needed at Washington such understanding of the situation, such statesman-like grasp of the facts of the case, as will yield policies that will harmonize with our traditional friendship with Japan. There is not the first doubt in the mind of the Argonaut that if a properly organized and authorized commission of Americans could be brought into conference with a similar group of Japanese statesmen all the interests in question could be brought to a just and friendly accommodation. The interests and ambitions of the two countries are not in collision. There is in the normal order of things no necessity for conflict or even of serious difference. In truth there is no Japanese problem not capable of solution by means comfortable with fair dealing and common sense.

Issues Forecasted.

As we write in mid-week the country is waiting eagerly for the terms and conditions of the campaign as they shall be defined by the presidential candidates in formal acceptances. For practically it was left to the candidates by both party conventions to outline the issues—in other words to make the party platforms. In the matter of more or less casual utterances Mr. Harding is rather more outspoken than Mr. Cox. He has found occasion to make himself very distinctly understood in respect of several important matters. Especially significant is his announcement that if elected he will closely associate the Vice-President with the administration of the government to the extent of inviting his presence at cabinet meetings and of counseling with him in important affairs. This is a departure from precedent of real significance; and it tends to emphasize Mr. Harding's further assurance that he will make the government something very different from the one-man affair that it has been during the Wilson régime. By character and temperament, no less than by practice in affairs, Mr. Harding is a man addicted to counsel. His is distinctly the coöperative mind. He will bring the government back to the constitutional basis and he will bring to bear upon questions as they arise such wisdom as may be gained by conference and comparison of information and judgments. He will have a cabinet that will be something more than a group of subservient clerks—a real cabinet made up of the best talent that the public life of the country affords. Surely the change is one that the country will welcome. We have had enough of inspirational genius. It will be a relief to get back to conditions in which the government in its determinations in matters great and small shall reflect, not the ideals and whims of a "super-man," but the conceptions and purposes of plain common sense. Government is not idealism. It is practical business. In the past our affairs have never gone so fortunately as when it has been representative of the composite character, the composite mind, the composite purpose of the American people. Its failures have always been associated with the whimsicalities of administration at the hands of officials whose assumption and vanity have led them to stray from the broad road of tradition and practice.

Mr. Harding has fairly and without diplomatic evasion taken ground with respect to the league of nations. He would have the United States associate itself with international affairs to the fullest extent compatible with its complete independence of international authority. He is for a league of nations, but not for the league as defined at Paris and sought to be imposed "sight unseen" by Mr. Wilson. He would so re-write the "covenant" as to reserve to the United States determination of its course in emergencies as they shall arise. He would not subject action on the part of the American government to the judgment or will of any international council. In brief Mr. Harding stands opposed to the Wilson league of nations until it shall be so pruned and purged as to exempt us from any obligation under it inconsistent with that detachment and independence which we have been taught to sustain by every leader in patriotic thought from Washington to Roosevelt.

So much of Mr. Harding's views and aims have already been given to the public in advance of the more comprehensive statement promised in his declaration of formal acceptance. Thus we see in the man, even in advance of a more complete setting forth of his views, reflection of the qualities of mind and character that prompted his nomination. He is no inspired genius; he is no super-man. He makes no pretensions of being other than a man of sound character, of experience in public affairs, of close acquaintance with the machinery of government, of working common sense.

It is to be said of Mr. Cox that since his nomination he has carried himself with modesty and dignity. It is perhaps due to lack of occasion that he has been more reserved than his Republican rival. But he has shown no disposition to evasion and there seems every reason to expect from him as time shall go on the fullest measure of plain-spoken candor. In times past it has been understood that Mr. Cox's views and sympathies have been with that faction of his party rather more than less unsympathetic with Mr. Wilson. It has come therefore as a surprise that after conference with the President he has declared his mind with respect to the league of nations as going with that of the President. He is for the league of nations as written at Paris without any modification. To what degree his view has been a concession to party unity, we may not know. Only this: Mr. Cox has the right to be taken at his word. He will go before the country for the league without the dotting of an i or the crossing of a t; just as Mr. Harding will go before the country for a league limited by reservations.

As to Prohibition.

Neither of the standard political parties found the courage to deal in its formal declaration of principles and policies with a question concerning which the country is profoundly interested, namely, that of prohibition. Of Mr. Cox's position we have a fair outline in his public career in Ohio. Disclaiming the character of a "wet" in the radical sense, he has had nevertheless in his three gubernatorial campaigns in Ohio the support of wet elements. His nomination at San Francisco was primarily supported by that faction of the Democratic party rather more than less affiliated with wet interests and distinctly representative of professional politics, always in the nature of things opposed to prohibition. Further, he is more or less affiliated politically with the labor element which openly protests the Volstead Act with its radical restrictions and its more than radical machinery of execution.

It may turn out that Mr. Cox and Mr. Harding stand on pretty much the same ground with respect to this great issue. True, Harding gave his vote in the Senate to the Volstead Act, also to the Eighteenth Amendment; but it was done in conjunction with a statement indicating a distinct lack of sympathy with much that was involved in it. In a speech on August 1st of last year, with reference to the then pending constitutional amendment, Mr. Harding declared that he was not a prohibitionist and that he considered it "unwise, imprudent, inconsiderate" to force the issue of extreme prohibition. "I do not," he said, "question the sincerity or the high purpose of the prohibition forces, but I do believe that it is a misfortune to the country to divide American citizenship into two hostile camps over this question of personal liberty at a time when we ought to be promoting the concord of citizenship that is essential to win this war. But since it is insistent that we must reach a decision now, I find myself impelled to take the side which I think must in the end contribute to the most good of our people."

Proceeding to the practical aspects of the issue, Mr. Harding said: "I do not think a prohibition amendment will be effective. You can not make any law stronger than the public sentiment which sees to its enforcement":

Ever since I have been in public life in a small way I have seen men continually measured by the wet and dry yardstick, and the submission of this amendment is going to measure every candidate for public office by the wet and dry yardstick until the final settlement. When I say that I have expressed my strongest reason for putting a limitation upon the pendency of the amendment. I want to see this question settled. I want to take it out of the halls of Congress and refer it to the people, who must make the ultimate decision. I want to make the demand for submission and witness a decision.

So then, in spite of its untimeliness, in spite of the lack of prudence in submitting it now, since we have come to this question of prohibition as a war measure and there has been a yielding on the one hand against drastic prohibition in the Food bill, I think this submission is a sort of compromise between the contending forces, and I am willing to be counted a compromising agent.

All our great movements are the result of such endeavors. I do not hesitate to say that I approach the question from a strong sense of justice, and if this amendment is submitted to the people of the United States and receives the sanction of three-fourths of the general assemblies, then if my tenure of office still obtains, I am willing to go further and join in a movement to make it effective through a process of compensation to the business destroyed.

Evidently neither in Mr. Cox nor Mr. Harding are we to have in the presidency a man radically, fanatically, hysterically predisposed in the matter of prohibition. This, in the judgment of the Argonaut, is to the good. Ultimate adjustment of this issue must be in accord with the dictates of moderation and common sense, so considerate of the higher public moralities as not to permit the hysterical and radical minority to impose an impertinent will in contempt of the fundamental principles of individual liberty.

Oil Supply for the Navy.

Back of the Union Oil Company's "defi" of Secretary Daniels—still pending—there is a significant history. When the United States entered the war in 1917 the wholesale market price of fuel oil at San Francisco was $1.30 per barrel. At this rate for fuel oil, and at varying rates for varying grades, oils were in strong commercial demand, the supply not being greater than the consumption for ordinary uses. One railroad company, consuming annually approximately fourteen million barrels (588,000,000 gallons), paid these prices, and the same with other wholesale consumers. Rates were defined by the commercial balance of demand and supply and there was no criticism of them as extortionate or unreasonable. Like other consumers of oil, the United States Navy supplied its needs at these rates.

In the first year of the war the commercial price of fuel oil in the San Francisco market advanced from $1.30 per barrel to $1.50, due to advances in wages and the general charges of production and transportation. As the consumptive demand increased out of ratio with production the Fuel Administration, seeking to stimulate activity in the fields, requested the marketing oil companies in California to advance the rate for crude oil at the wells from 98 cents per barrel to $1.23. This rate—or higher—has since been paid at the wells, three hundred or more miles from tide water. Concurrently the Fuel Administration requested that the market rate to consumers be not increased more than 15 cents per barrel. In other words it was desired by the Fuel Administration that the marketing companies, while increasing the price paid to producers at the wells in the sum of 25 cents per barrel, should themselves absorb the differential between the buying price and the selling price to the extent of 10 cents per barrel; and to this suggestion the marketing companies consented. The immediate effect was to advance the commercial rate at the seaboard to $1.60 per barrel, and this rate was paid by all wholesale purchasers, including the Army and the Federal Railroad Administration.

The Navy Department, as has already been stated, supplied its demands previous to our entrance into the war at the ordinary commercial rates. But in the early period of the war the naval authorities took ground that oil prices were excessive. They did not go so far as to declare what the rates should be, but on the theory that the basic price of $1.60 per barrel was unreasonable they presented contracts in the form of requisition orders (required to be formally accepted) in which was written in an arbitrary basic rate of $1.08 per barrel for fuel oil. These orders, in effect contracts, did not assume that the rate of $1.08 per barrel was just compensation for the product requisitioned. They recited that it was "impracticable to now determine just compensation for the material to be delivered"; and further, "the fixing of the price will be subject to later determination." The suppliers were "assured of just compensation." Thus the procedure of the Navy Department expressly disregarded specific provisions of the several war acts to the effect that in the exercise of power to commandeer or seize material in the case of imminent war emergency the President shall first fix just compensation for the material taken.

In the first year of the war the Navy Department commandeered its Pacific Coast oil supply at the tentative rate of $1.08 per barrel, whereas the commercial rate ranged from $1.30 to $1.60 per barrel. Early in 1918 the Navy Department advanced its tentative payments from $1.08 to $1.47 per barrel, still leaving the matter of final price to future adjustment, but assuring the marketing companies that they would be allowed a "reasonable profit." Upon expiration of the 1918 requisition orders the Navy Department, without explanation and with no apparent justification, reduced the rate for fuel oil in its requisition orders from $1.47 per barrel to 86 cents per barrel. No explanation was offered nor any plan proposed under which the marketing companies might proceed in collecting or even adjusting the difference between the prescribed price and the market price. This new requisition, made under the commandeering authority of war legislation, came to the marketing oil companies of California at a time when the war had been ended approximately a year before and when peace terms had been accepted by the German government. The market price of fuel oil in California was then $1.60 per barrel, which as compared with the arbitrary price (86 cents) prescribed and enforced by the Navy Department left the wide margin of 74 cents per barrel.

Such was the situation on the first of July, 1919, when requisition was made upon the Shell Company at Martinez for delivery of fuel oil to the Navy under an order from the Navy Department to demand supply at the rate of 86 cents per barrel, and in case this demand should not be accepted to take the oil by force. Under threat of seizure of its plant the Shell Company, though protesting, yielded to the demand, thus surrendering at 86 cents per barrel a product for which it had paid $1.23 at the wells, three hundred miles inland. Other companies have followed this precedent, and now for something more than a year the Navy has been supplying its needs by requisition backed by threat of seizure at practically half the price paid by ordinary consumers.

Thus in time of actual peace (though of theoretical war), when there is no military or other emergency, the Navy Department has been taking from the oil companies of California a product commercially in large demand at practically half its value, still under assurance of ultimate adjustments. Under this procedure there is due from the Navy Department to the marketing oil companies of California somewhere between two and four million dollars. The accounts are being carried under promise of adjustment, but no attempt at adjustment has been made. When Secretary Daniels has been requested to make adjustment he has put the matter off with vague promises and, if truth be told, in terms of studied insolence.

The action of the Union Oil Company in declining to answer a requisition for oil for the Navy at a rate below the market price, and in defying the naval authorities to proceed by force, has brought a long-sustained contention to a final test. Secretary Daniels is present in Pacific waters and it is for him to determine if the Navy Department is to continue its policy of arbitrary purchase of oil supply at rates far below market price by exercise of force. Up to last reports Mr. Daniels has not acted. The Union Oil Company has not responded to the demand of the naval authorities and the latter have not followed up their threat of taking forcible possession of the Union plant and thus supplying their needs. Mr. Daniels is evidently taking second thought.

The Fifth Amendment of the Federal Constitution provides "nor shall private property be taken for public use without just compensation." This is one of the articles of the Bill of Rights adopted as a restraint on the powers of the Federal government over the states and the inhabitants thereof. The Supreme Court of the United States has repeatedly interpreted the language of the Fifth Amendment, which, it has said, "carries the idea of equivalent," and the court pointed out that "just compensation" means "a full and perfect equivalent for the property taken." The cost, the court said, is not the criterion, but rather the value to the owner. The Federal courts have repeatedly said that the compensation to be paid for private property taken for public use is "the market value of such property at the time of the exercise of the power." In another case the Supreme Court has said that "the considerations are to be the same as in the sale of property between private parties."

The policy of Congress as declared in war legislation—and it is under the Lever Act that the procedures above recited have been carried out—has been observed scrupulously by the various departments of the government. Only the Navy Department has proceeded to requisition or seizure of supplies without making a bona fide effort to determine a just compensation and tendering the same to the supplier at the time of requisition. If there is any law purporting to give an executive officer of the United States authority to seize property without tendering fair value therefor or without providing a definite, speedy, and convenient method of arriving at that value, it can not be other than in contempt of the Constitution. As a matter of fact there is no such law. The Lever Act, even if it were at this time of actual peace in legitimate authority, does not warrant the procedure of the Navy Department.

The Union Oil Company has done a vital service to the country in forcing a definition of the powers of a department of the government. It is time that there should be definite determination at this point. If an executive department may disregard plain principles of business dealing, if it may hold its authority above the mandate of the Constitution—if a department of the government may at a time void of emergency by force seize private property without "just compensation"—then the Constitution of the United States is a dead letter.

Editorial Notes.

Why, the Argonaut is asked, do the prohibition and the woman suffrage "workers" keep up aggressive campaigns in view of the fact that both causes have definitely been won? The answer is easy. The "movements" have become in a sense vested interests. They are managed by professional groups who find both employment and a certain distinction in agitation. They are agitators both by temperament and fixed habit. And they will not cease their efforts so long as gullible enthusiasts may be induced to put up money.

AN OLD FAMILIAR STORY.

Gustav Hilger, whoever he may be, says that the overthrow of the Soviet government is only a matter of time. That, of course, is true. Time will overthrow all things except human folly, which seems to be immortal. If Mr. Hilger has nothing better to say than this he might as well have held his peace. But while waiting for time to accomplish its usual and salutary work of destruction, Mr. Hilger informs us that the Soviet government is now stronger than it ever was before. The Russian people are anxious to destroy it, but they have no power to do so.

How familiar it all sounds. How often we have heard it before. Every change in the kaleidoscopic policies of Europe toward Russia has been heralded by the announcement that the Bolsheviks are now trembling on the brink of the abyss, and that only the gentlest of gentle pushes will be needed to send them over. One wonders who it is that waves the magic wand over our press dispatches and so dictates the tune that our credulities shall play. Who is it that ordains in January that the Bolshevik government shall be pictured as a sort of kingdom of hell upon earth, only to tone down the lurid colors in February and to paint that same government in a more benignant hue? Who is the deus ex machina who bedevils our bewildered minds with lies?

The facts are beginning to be clearly visible, and he who runs may read. When Mr. Hilger says that all Russia would willingly turn on the Bolsheviks, but that they have not the power he is talking undiluted nonsense. There are one hundred and seventy millions of people in Russia. Does Mr. Hilger mean to say that one hundred and seventy millions of people are dominated by a Moscow clique and compelled to accept a régime that they abhor? How does he know that? The walls of Jericho fell hardly more quickly than the government of the Czar with all its vast mechanism of terrorism, massacre, secret agents, police, and reptiles of the Black Hand, a mechanism perfected by centuries of autocracy. Why should the régime of Lenine be more firmly established against the popular will? There was a time without question when the fangs of this snake might have been drawn, but now the day of grace has passed. When Europe at the peace conference partitioned Russia as though she were in the African Black Belt, when she stole her territories from her under the wretched plea of self-determination, when she treated Russia as Poland was treated centuries ago, she sealed her own doom. She aroused the patriotism of Russia. She identified Russia with Bolshevism. She made of the Bolsheviks the protagonists of Russia. They became the defenders of the holy soil and its representatives. Lord Chesterfield once invited his son to go forth and see with what little wisdom this world is governed. Surely human government never before approached the depths of inanity to which it has now descended.

Mr. Walter Lippmann tells us that the Russian Red army now numbers three million veterans and that their war tactics suggest a master military mind. In the lack of railroads they employ vast clouds of cavalry. They are sweeping the Poles before them, and the whole of the old eastern front, with the Pripet Marsh for its centre, is a blaze of bloody fighting. How does this agree with Mr. Hilger's roseate summary of the Russian mind. The Russian army is within reach of Warsaw, and it contemptuously refuses the British request for an armistice. Warsaw would turn Bolshevik tomorrow if Lenine were to give the word, but he does not wish to give the word until his armies are closer to the city. Lenine refuses to send emissaries to London. He refuses to negotiate. Why should he negotiate? He has the ball at his feet. He can do as he pleases.

He refuses the British offer as contemptuously as he refused President Wilson's plea for peace through the mediation of Mr. Bullitt and Mr. Steffens. President Wilson made that plea for peace, he hoisted that white flag, at the very moment when we were being served with our usual and favorite diet of lies about the imminent collapse of the Bolsheviks. Lenine, it seems, is as impudent as ever, and we are as credulous as ever. On the back pages of our newspapers we find the obscure items that predict the domination of Bolshevism, and Asia in flames. Our front pages we devote to the tweedle dums and tweedle dees of local affairs or the antics of an Egyptian dancer. How readily we return to our vomit.

Russia has made peace with the Finns. She has made peace with the Letts, and the line is now open to Riga. Lithuania will go with Poland. Russia has come to terms with Georgia. She has settled the new frontiers of Armenia, which now practically belongs to her. She has allied herself with the Turks of Asia Minor and with the Tartars of Azerbaijan. Khiva is Red and Bokhara is becoming so. Persia is asking aid of Russia and is ready to go Red at any moment. Russian armies are actually advancing on Armenia and have occupied Karabagh. Other Russian armies are effecting a union with Mustapha Kemal Pasha, and the Mohammedans of the world are being called to arms. India is in a ferment in defense of Turkey, and no one knows what is going on in Egypt. Such are some of the results of the outrages inflicted upon Russia by the peace conference, a world full of volcanic rumblings that increase day by day in violence, of portents of immeasurable calamity. And Mr. Hilger tells us that the overthrow of the Soviet government is only a matter of time. Disavowing any intention to be profane, we may truly say that it is a hell of a time.

There would be hope if only now there were some signs of wisdom, but there are none. No political wisdom may be expected from democracies avid for lies, determinedly believing a false thing. Mr. Lloyd George says that he could not carry out a rightful policy toward Russia because a great newspaper proprietor had so poisoned the mind of the public. The public mind everywhere has been poisoned. It has been poisoned with lies about the situation in Europe. It has been poisoned with assurances that we are well out of the mess and that European chaos means nothing to America. It means everything to America. There are contagions that no ocean can dilute.

Poland was the buffer state against Bolshevism until a month or so ago. Now Poland has been submerged, or is likely to be. What will happen to Germany when the Red armies are on her frontier? Now the rulers of Germany do not want Bolshevism. No matter how radical they may be, they do not want Bolshevism. Rulers never do. They do not wish to be displaced, ousted. So long as Poland was the buffer state we played fast and loose with her. We were neither her friends nor her enemies. We applauded her at one moment and rebuffed her the next. We promised her aid and did not send it. Now it seems that she is doomed. In that event the buffer state becomes Germany. German statesmen, pleading for a larger army, point to the Russian forces on their eastern frontier. What can they do to resist those armies if they are to be allowed no more than a police force? Now no one will be disposed to take the German word for anything until we are quite sure that it is consonant with German interests. But in this case we are quite sure. Germany does not want Bolshevism. It is diametrically opposed to the German spirit. It would be fatal to any designs for world domination in the future that she may still cherish. But what will happen to Germany if Poland is overwhelmed and Red armies appear on the German frontier? But there is no need to ask such a question. It is already answered. Unable to resist those armies, she will assuredly join them. What else could she do? She will make those armies her own, and Germany will become Bolshevik. And if Germany becomes Bolshevik, what will happen to Italy and to France? Are we prepared to see an alliance between Germany and Red Russia? Is this one of the things that do not concern us?

Unless Germany is allowed to defend herself she will be overwhelmed. It is nearly as certain as the sunrise. Germany ought to be allowed to raise an army large enough for the purpose, even at the risk of some revival of her strength. The danger from Russia is infinitely greater than the danger from a strengthened Germany. Either Germany must be enabled to repel the Red armies or the Allies must repel them for her. And any European statesman who would suggest the sending of an army against Russia would maintain his position for about twenty-four hours. It would seem, then, that there is no way to prevent the submergence of Poland, no way to prevent the Red armies from reaching the German frontier. But there is a way to prevent them from crossing the German frontier. The way is by means of a German army, and it would seem that a German army is not to be allowed.

A few months more and we shall see what we shall see. But at least let us cease to talk nonsense about the collapse of the Soviet government. The unlikely may, of course, happen. Pigs may fly. But when we come down to the domain of actual facts we find that the Soviet government is very much stronger than it has ever been before and that we need no longer mock at Lenine when he says that he will soon be master of Europe and that he will light a blaze in Asia that it may take decades to extinguish. We should also show our sanity by ceasing to talk nonsense about our unconcern with the European mess.

And lest it should be thought that the foregoing is unduly alarmist it may be well to quote some words written by Mr. Vanderlip a few weeks ago. Mr. Vanderlip is not an alarmist nor a sensationalist, but a banker of conservative tendencies. And Mr. Vanderlip says: "A coalition of the military power of Russia with that of Germany, Russian military leadership being supplemented by German experience, would offer to the Entente a most difficult problem. If that coalition were ever found to include Japan, the whole world would be affected by the result. A coalition between Germany and Russia offers most disturbing possibilities."

So why choose this particular time to pick a quarrel with Japan?

INDIVIDUALITIES.

Among well-known writers who were born in Maine are the following: Sarah Orne Jewett, at South Berwick; Holman F. Day, popular novelist, at Vassalboro, and Jacob Abbott, author of the Rollo books, at Halliowell. Cyrus H. K. Curtis, publisher of the Saturday Evening Post, Ladies Home Journal, and other widely known publications, was born at Portland, and Frank A. Munsey was born at Mercer.

A young shepherd-sculptor, Paul Darde, has won the French national prize for sculpture. The stories of Darde, as told in the English newspapers, emphasize the dramatic climax of the young man's career, a career which started in the Cevennes with sheep-tending and resulted in winning the national prize. According to the story of Darde, which reads like that of King David, the boy attracted the attention of an art professor who was on a holiday in the Cevennes. The professor was impressed with the boy's skill in cutting animals and figures with an old jack-knife out of wood and soft stone.

Mr. Peter Bender, the "Bead King," started in business with a most undesirable capital, a debt of five thousand dollars. But he knew tapestry wool and he knew beads; both, he explains, because in the department store where he had worked they required a knowledge of detail that no other clerk thought worth while acquiring. He saw that no one cared to know about beads and tapestry wool, so he specialized in the two, and opened his little shop with tapestry wool as the leading feature and beads as a side line. It was not many years before the tapestry wool became the side line, and the boxes on the floor, on the shelves, on the counters, were filled to overflowing with beads.

Lloyd George, Britain's prime minister, is an able French scholar, and the story of how he mastered the language is not without interest. The death of his father had left the family penniless, and the future statesman was brought up in the family of an old uncle, who was a shoemaker in a little Welsh village. There was not opportunity of learning French in the village, and yet young Lloyd George considered a knowledge of French necessary to his future success. The way he got out of the difficulty was for his old uncle and himself to sit for hours laboriously spelling out of an old French dictionary and out of a grammar the rudiments of the language.

Señor Portal, for the last thirty years the leading journalist of Peru and the author of twelve "best sellers" in that country, has done for his native land what Luis Taboada did for Spain, Mark Twain for the United States, and, long ago, Molière for France: while waging war with his pen, he has created true literature. Thirty years ago, when he laid down the sword he had carried with honor through the Peruvian struggle with Chile, he took up arms against every imaginable weakness, shortcoming, sin, and vice of his fellow-countrymen; and in laughter-provoking sarcasm and scathing irony he has depicted all the wickedness to which flesh—and particularly Peruvian flesh—is heir.

Dr. Royal Meeker, Commissioner of the Bureau of Labor Statistics, United States Department of Labor, is a trained economist who rose from the ranks of manual labor. Dr. Meeker has brought to his job an intimate experience with working conditions, as well as wide education and training received in universities of this country and Europe. Prior to becoming a government official he was assistant professor of political economy at Princeton. It is probable that no such thorough social and economic studies as those directed by Dr. Meeker during recent years were ever before made anywhere. The pay-rolls of numerous industries, chiefly those known as basic, have been subjected to minute scrutiny by his force of statisticians. Thousands of workmen's families in veritably every industry and occupation throughout the country have furnished him with data on earnings and expenditures at different times. The information thus procured has been made available to workmen and employers and has been used frequently in adjusting wage disputes.

Thanatopsis.

To him who in the love of nature holds
Communion with her visible forms, she speaks
A various language; for his gayer hours
She has a voice of gladness, and a smile
And eloquence of beauty; and she glides
Into his darker musings with a mild
And healing sympathy, that steals away
Their sharpness ere he is aware. When thoughts
Of the last litter hour come like a blight
Over thy spirit, and sad images
Of the stern agony, and shroud and pall,
And breathless darkness, and the narrow house,
Make thee to shudder, and grow sick at heart—
Go forth, under the open sky, and list
To nature's teachings, while from all around—
Earth and her waters, and the depths of air—
Comes a still voice: Yet a few days, and thee
The all-beholding sun shall see no more
In all his course; nor yet in the cold ground,
Where thy pale form was laid with many tears,
Nor in the embrace of ocean shall exist
Thy image. Earth, that nourished thee, shall claim
Thy growth to be resolve to earth again;
And, lost each human trace, surrendering up
Thine individual being, shalt thou go
To mix forever with the elements—
To be a brother to the insensate rock,
And to the sluggish clod which the rude swain
Turns with his snare, and treads upon. The oak Shall send his roots abroad, and pierce thy mould.

Yet not to thine eternal resting-place
Shalt thou retire alone, nor couldst thou wish
Couch more magnificent. Thou shalt lie down
With patriarchs of the infant world—with kings,
The powerful of the earth—the wise, the good—
Fair forms, and hoary seers of ages past
All in one mighty sepulchre. The hills
Rock-ribbed and ancient as the sun,—the vales
Stretching in pensive quietness between—
The venerable woods,—rivers that move
In majesty, and the complaining brooks
That make the meadows green; and, poured round all,
Old ocean's gray and melancholy waste,—
Are but the solemn decorations all
Of the great tomb of man. The golden sun,
The planets, all the infinite host of heaven,
Are shining on the sad abodes of death,
Through the still lapse of ages. All that tread
The globe are but a handful to the tribes
That slumber in its bosom—Take the wings
Of morning; traverse Barca's desert sands,
Or lose thyself in the continuous woods
Where rolls the Oregon, and hears no sound
Save his own dashings—yet—the dead are there;
And millions in those solitudes, since first
The flight of years began, have laid them down
In their last sleep—the dead reign there alone.

So shalt thou rest; and what if thou withdraw
In silence from the living, and no friend
Take note of thy departure? All that breathe
Will share thy destiny. The gay will laugh
When thou art gone, the solemn hrood of care
Plod on, and each one as before will chase
His favorite phantom; yet all these shall leave
Their mirth and their employments, and shall come
And make their bed with thee. As the long train
Of ages glide away, the sons of men,
The youth in life's green spring, and he who goes
In the full strength of years—matron and maid,
And the sweet haire, and the gray-headed man,—
Shall one by one be gathered to thy side
By those, who in their turn shall follow them.

So live that when thy summons comes to join
The innumerable caravan which moves
To that mysterious realm where each shall take
His chamber in the silent halls of death,
Thou go not like the quarry slave at night,
Scourged to his dungeon; but, sustained and soothed
By an unfaltering trust, approach thy grave
Like one who wraps the drapery of his couch
About him, and lies down to pleasant dreams.

SOME AMERICAN PROBLEMS.

Mr. Otto H. Kahn Writes a Volume from the Point of View of the American Financier.

The world of finance has but rarely defended itself against the attacks of the demagogue. It has usually allowed judgment to go by default even when the defense was clear and unanswerable, and perhaps this may be counted as chief among its sins of omission. The public, in spite of its temporary aberrations, has a desire to be fair and to hear the other side, but the other side has so seldom been forthcoming. It is a mistake that seems in the way to be realized and corrected.

Mr. Otto H. Kahn describes his book as "a financier's point of view," and it is made up of more or less disconnected articles and speeches written or delivered during the last few years upon topics of almost equal interest to the average citizen and to the banker. Part One consists of a sketch of Mr. Harriman. Part Two is devoted to Business and Economics. Part Three concerns War and Foreign Relations, and in Part Four we have some comments on Art. Mr. Kahn's range is therefore a wide one.

Mr. Harriman, we are reminded, reached the age of nearly fifty years without attracting any general attention. The author has unstinted admiration for his tenacity, resolution, and courage. He was the last of the railroad Titans, and while he claims to be by no means blind to his shortcomings, "I believe it may be truly said of him as it was said of another great man that his faults were largely those of his generation, his virtues were his own." He had no regard for appearances, and while he was a gentleman by birth and breeding, by instinct, intent, and principles, yet he rode roughshod over conventionalities and amenities:

While he was inwardly a man of genuine kindness, of whom many a generous and warm-hearted action might be related, and would not for the world knowingly have hurt any one's feelings, he had extraordinary faculty for doing that very thing, for rubbing people the wrong way, for causing himself and his actions to be misunderstood and misjudged. He was master of what Whistler called "the gentle art of making enemies." His manner was brusque; he was short tempered, though he had his temper under perfect control, and never lost it, whatever the provocation—in fact the greater the strain the more perfect his calm and self-possession.

Mr. Kahn's article on Government Ownership of Railroads was delivered as an address before the National Industrial Conference Board on October 10, 1918. It has already been justified by events, and more than justified. The legislation of 1909 was shaped by legislators of radical tendencies and hostile to the railroads. Paternalistic control for the first time was established over the roads, and it was a control shaped in heat, hurry, and anger. The states, of course, followed the example of the Federal government, and the resulting structure was little short of a legislative monstrosity:

You all know the result. The spirit of enterprise in rail-roading was killed. Subjected to an obsolete and incongruous national policy, hampered, confined, harassed by multifarious, minute, narrow, and sometimes flatly contradictory regulations and restrictions, state and Federal, starved as to rates in the face of steadily mounting costs of labor and materials—that great industry began to fall away. Initiative on the part of those in charge became chilled, the free flow of investment capital was halted, creative ability was stopped, growth was stifled, credit was crippled.

Americans are not prone to consider the examples of other countries, nor to turn to the pages of history for the wisdom of experience. A certain national egotism interferes, an innate conviction that superior intelligence will find a way where others have failed. None the less Mr. Kahn suggests a perusal of a pamphlet entitled "Historical Sketch of Government Ownership of Railroads in Foreign Countries," by the great English authority, Mr. W. M. Acworth:

Mr. Acworth mentions as a characteristic indication that after years of sad experience with governmentally owned and operated railways, the Italian government, just before the war, started on a new departure (or rather returned to the old system) of granting a concession to a private enterprise which was to take over a portion of the existing state railway, build an extension with the aid of state subsidies, and then work on its own account both sections as one undertaking under private management.

I may add that shortly before the outbreak of the war the Belgian government was studying the question of returning its state railways to private enterprise and management.

Mr. Acworth relates a resolution unanimously passed by the French senate a few years after the state had taken over certain lines, beginning with the words: "The deplorable situation of the state system, the insecurity and irregularity of its workings." He gives figures demonstrating the invariably greater efficiency, economy, and superiority of service of private management as compared to state management in countries where these two systems are in operation side by side. He treats the effect of the conflicting interests, sectional and otherwise, which necessarily come into play under government control when the question arises where new lines are to be built and what extensions are to be made of existing lines.

On the subject of Taxation Mr. Kahn points out that a very heavy excess profit tax in peace times does not accomplish the purpose aimed at and that on the other hand it tends to hurt trade, discourage enterprise, and burden the public. It has intensified profiteering, but its repeal or modification must be accompanied by a well-judged revision of the existing scale of taxation of individual incomes:

1. Comparing our income taxation with that of England, we find that in that country taxation starts with incomes (or married men) of $725, here with incomes of $2000. The English tax on the smaller incomes, say, up to $5000 is, on the average, about six times as heavy as ours. On the other hand, our tax in its upper scale is far heavier than that of England. The English maximum taxation is 52½%, ours is 73%, without including state income taxes. That is by far the highest scale of income taxation existing anywhere in the civilized world.

The English normal tax, i. e., the tax applicable to the lowest incomes, is 30%. Our normal tax is 4% on the first $4000 of taxable income, and 8% on incomes above that amount. On the other hand, the highest rate of English surtax is 22½%; our highest rate of surtax is 65%. That is to say, in England the highest income taxpayer is taxed at a rate less than twice that applicable to the lowest taxpayer (though it must be borne in mind that certain deductions are allowed on these small incomes.) With us (deductions being likewise allowed on small incomes) the highest income taxpayer is taxed at a rate seventeen times as heavy as that applicable to the lowest taxpayer.

The financial strain in Europe has been much more than in America. England, France, and Italy are just as democratic as we are, but no European government has deemed it wise to impose rates of income taxation as high as the upper grades of ours. They are not more tender of rich men than we are, but they know the evils of excessive taxation:

Extreme rates of taxation do not and can not fully reach those whom they are intended to reach, but they do inevitably reach, in one way or another, in their ultimate consequences, the masses of the people.

He who would lead the people to believe that they can be benefited—or, indeed, that they are other than greatly harmed—by oppressive taxation of capital, fools himself, or attempts to fool others.

Such taxation is bound, in the end, to lead to stagnation and retrogression. The prosperity of a community is a matter of manifold and subtle interrelations. In the long run labor can not be abundantly employed and well paid nor can the farmer and the small trader be prosperous unless business at large is enabled to grow and prosper.

Mr. Kahn favors a sales tax. He says it would aggregate a far smaller burden by the time it reaches the consumer than our prevailing array of taxes. It would weigh far more lightly on the rank and file than do the results of our existing taxation:

A trifling sales tax on the huge volume of commodities changing hands annually would yield so vast a revenue that it would enable the excess profit tax and practically all other abnormal business taxes (except perhaps the corporate income tax) to be eliminated, surtaxes on individual incomes to be greatly reduced, and Federal taxation of incomes up to, say, $4000 to be abolished altogether.

Paternalism, says the author, is one of the great evils that threaten us and that must be resisted. It is paternalism that allowed France to be out-distanced by other countries, and it is paternalism of another kind that hurried Germany on the road to her debacle:

In Germany, bureaucracy and paternalism plus militarism and junkerism, had resulted in bringing untold misery upon the world at large and inevitable disaster in the end to the German people. And that notwithstanding the fact that not only was the German system of bureaucracy and paternalism the most efficient the world had ever seen, but that with deep and insidious cunning it camouflaged its true meaning and purpose in that it made an alliance with big business by which, in return for being left alone and, if need be, supported in its political dominion and in its particular interests, it maintained a reciprocal attitude toward the great combinations in finance and industry. It furthered enterprise and gave liberal scope and rich reward to achievement. Its method of dealing with labor was in part to coerce it and deprive it, by direct or indirect means, of adequate voting and political power and in part to cajole and conciliate it by apparently progressive and fair-seeming social welfare legislation. In other words it aimed at making contented and prosperous chainhears out of the German people, and at the same time—and alas! all too successfully—at substituting for their old conceptions and ideals a religion of greed, covetousness, power-worship, and materialism, the deity of which was the state as represented by its ruling caste.

The principle of equality, says Mr. Kahn, is one that must be accepted with much caution. There must be equality before the law, equality of political rights, equality of opportunity, but none the less an inscrutable Providence has bestowed upon us inequalities of natural endowment:

A lady said to me the other day: "It makes me angry that Mr. X should live in that splendid house, while I have only a simple flat. Such inequalities ought not to be allowed. It is not fair that he should be thus favored." I answered: "Is it fair that you happen to be good to look upon and bright and attractive to talk to (all of which she was), while some others of your sex, pardon the ungallant observation, are plain or dull? Because of this gross inequality, galling as it must be to some of those less favored, do you think there should be a law providing that all women must go veiled and have other appropriate restraints put upon the power of their attractiveness? Do you realize that if all incomes above $100,000 were confiscated, as has been urged by some, and which in your present frame of mind you would presumably favor, the resulting sum would barely cover our war expenditures for one month? Do you know that if all incomes above even $10,000 were taken and distributed among those earning less than $10,000, the result, as far as I can figure out, would be that the aggregate income of those receiving that distribution would be increased barely 10 per cent?" I used various other arguments and examples, "not without interruption and rejoinder on her part. I do not flatter myself that I succeeded in converting her, but I believe when we parted she was a little less sure than before that Mr. X ought to be turned out of his fine house forthwith.

As an introduction to his chapter on "The Task Ahead" the author tells us of an incident that happened to him in 1918 on the occasion of his return to America from a trip to England and France. As he was standing around on the deck a begrimed stoker stuck his head out of one of the gangways and began talking to him:

With the unceremonious directness of the seafaring man, he started in: "Say, I hear you are one of them rich Wall Street fellows." I admitted that I had been reasonably successful and acknowledged that I was a banker. "Well," he inquired, "would you have as much as a million dollars?" Thinking of the income tax and having in mind the disguises of Sherlock Holmes, I gave a carefully guarded reply. However, he took it for an affirmation and continued: "If I had a million dollars I would not be seen on this ocean nowadays, where you might be blowed up any minute." "Well," I said, "I had some duties to attend to on the other side, and I had to go." He replied imperturbably: "If I had a million dollars, I would hire some one to attend to my duties for me." "Hold on, my friend," I said, "let's argue this a minute. I had a cabin amidships on the upper deck, with plenty of life-belts around me, right opposite one of the life-boats. If anything happened, the chances were at least two to one that I would come off all right. You are down in the stokehole. If the Huns get the ship the chances are against you. You are quite liable to be hit or drowned. Now, from your appearance it is evident that you are beyond the draft age. You could get a good safe job on land in a munition factory or somewhere else, paying you at least as much as you get now, probably more. Why do you stay on this ship? Why don't you quit such dangerous business?" He looked straight at me and drew himself up and said, "Well, who would run the damned ships if we all felt that way? I aint no white-livered skunk. I have a duty to the country." And then we shook hands.

Mr. Kahn saw a good deal of the army in Europe and he felt that there had returned the ancient spirit of knighthood. He tells the following story in confirmation:

A French officer who commanded a body of French troops, fighting fiercely and almost hopelessly in Belleau Wood near Château-Thierry (since then officially designated by the French government as the Wood of the Marine Brigade), told me that when they had arrived almost at the point of total exhaustion, suddenly the Americans appeared rushing to the rescue. One of the American officers hurried up to him, saluted and said in exuberantly pronounced French just six words: "Vous—fatigués, vous—partir, notre job." "You—tired, you—get away, our job."

And right nobly did they do their job. Need I ask whether we shall do ours?

Mr. Kahn has a word to say about the British army. It is one of the characteristics of the British people, he says, not to blow their own horn, and this is one of the reasons why full recognition has not been given to the work done by the British. Another reason is the adroit German propaganda, which has conducted to the same end:

That propaganda has been, from the beginning of the war, and is now at work to belittle the British war effort and war achievement; to sow in the Allied countries—particularly America and France—the seeds of suspicion and dissension in respect of England; to try and cause, even within the British Empire itself, ill-feeling and division by circulating the insidious falsehood that the people of England have sacrificed, fought and suffered less, relatively, than those of Scotland and Wales and the colonies and dominions.

And then we have a seasonable word as to the proper American attitude toward the war and to some official pronouncements that can hardly be recalled with equanimity:

And, without the slightest wish to revive old controversies, may I add this: For three terrible years the Allied nations fought and bled and suffered before America came to realize that their fight was our fight and that our place was by their side. During those years we drew enormous wealth from their resources, depleted in the struggle for a sacred cause. Some memories, none too pleasant to recall, attach to certain pronouncements from the highest American quarter and to certain aspects of our official attitude in that fateful period.

Mr. Kahn has also something to say about our attitude toward the German-American, with apologies for the use of that ugly term:

Numerous German-Americans (to use, for the sake of brevity, an ugly term) knowing and correctly gauging the abhorrent spirit and intolerable aims of Prussianism were and acted from the very beginning, in 1914, wholeheartedly in favor of the Allies, though most of these adherents of the Allied cause refrained from open demonstration because they felt they were not entirely welcome or entirely trusted in the Allied camp, and their self-respect and fear of having their motives misinterpreted forbade them to give voice publicly to their true feelings. Others, again, who had been hesitant or even pro-German in their sympathies in the early stages of the war, gradually, as the hideousness of the spirit and doctrines of Junkerdom revealed itself in revolting deeds, began to realize that the cause of the Allies was that of right and humanity, and adjusted their attitude to that recognition.

A considerable number, especially of the Jewish faith, whose apparent pro-Germanism had merely been anti-Czarism, as they were unable to believe in or adhere to a cause of the success of which the old Russian régime was to be one of the principal beneficiaries, became converts to the Allied cause, coincident with the Russian revolution, and demonstrated the genuineness of their new allegiance, even before America entered the war, by energetically using their influence in Russia against all thought of a separate peace.

Although Mr. Kahn describes his book as a presentation of the financier's point of view it might more aptly be described as the point of view of the intelligent and broad-gauge American. It is alike sound, liberal, and convincing.

OUR ECONOMIC AND OTHER PROBLEMS. By Otto H. Kahn. New York: George H. Doran Company.

Physicists never tire of efforts to increase the accuracy of their knowledge of the fundamental facts of science. A redetermination of the velocity of light by the Fizeau toothed wheel method was made at Nice. These experiments were remarkable on account of the great distance over which the beam of light employed was transmitted. Previously such a beam had been caused to travel about fifteen miles, but on this occasion the reflecting mirror was so placed that the total distance traversed by the beam, going and returning, was fifty-seven miles. The mean of 1109 observations gave for the velocity of light 186,225½ miles a second.

Details of the deaths of 361,854 French soldiers are unknown.

BANKING AND INVESTMENT NEWS.

San Francisco's bank clearings for the week ending July 17, 1920, were $177,400,000; for the corresponding week of last year, $159,200,000; a gain of $18,200,000.

A gain of considerably over $12,000,000 in gold with the Federal Reserve agent brought total gold reserves of the Reserve Bank of San Francisco up $5,029,000 over the week before, according to the statement for the week ending July 16th. Total gold held by the bank fell off $9,101,000. Total resources were larger by $9,771,000. They amounted to $436,388,000, compared with $341,759,000 in the corresponding week of 1919.

The heavy financial requirements at the end of the half-year have been met successfully and without any undue money strain. We should have a month or so of easier money conditions until the crop-moving demand sets ties to be worked out, and Southern Pacific, on account of its enormously valuable oil-land holdings, would seem the proper leaders of the higher-priced railroad stocks in any such movement, while Southern Railway, already showing the presence of a powerful pool, Rock Island, Missouri Pacific Preferred, Pittsburgh and West Virginia, Western Pacific and St. Louis and San Francisco are among the most attractive of the low-priced rails.

The market for industrials has been showing a steadily advancing tendency for some weeks past and still indicates nothing like the distribution by insiders that is followed invariably by a collapse in prices. Most of the month should see rising values for leading industrials. Just now equipment stocks are coming more and more into favor on account of the beginning that the Interstate Commerce Commission has made in helping restore the railroads to a condition where efficient transportation facilities are possible.

There has been a good deal of bearish comment from time to time on stocks of the so-called non-essential industries, and doubtless a large bear account has been built up in some of the motor issues. The manufacture of automobiles of one kind or another, however, is anything but non-essential in our modern-day activities, and bears, too confident, will wake up to this fact sooner or later.

The steel group as a whole is very cheap at current prices. Incidentally the railroads and automobile manufacturers use up a very large proportion of our steel capacity.

Our allies are attempting to settle the matter of indemnities, and any success along this line will, of course, be of a constructive character so far as the world's business is concerned. There is talk of American interests joining in the purchase of a French tobacco monopoly. It is evident that big things lie abroad for American business enterprise and they will not be overlooked.

E. H. Rollins & Co. is participating in an offer of $20,000,000 notes of the United States Rubber Company. The notes are being offered at 98½ and interest at 7½ per cent. at par.

The notes run for ten years and are dated August 1st. They bear coupons and are in denominations of $500 and $1000. They are registrable as to principal only and both principal and interest are payable in New York without deduction for normal Federal income tax not over 2 per cent.

These notes will be a direct general credit obligation of the company and will be additionally secured by the pledge of $25,000,000, face value, of the company's first and refunding 6s due January 1, 1947, which are issued under the same mortgage as that securing the first and refunding 5s, Series A, due 1947. These latter are selling at about 79½ and interest, to yield 6.65 per cent. On a 6.65 per cent. basis (92 and interest) these $25,000,000 new pledged 6s would be worth about $23,000,000. At 80 and interest (a 7.75 per cent. basis) they would still be worth $20,000,000. The company's 7 per cent. notes, due December, 1923 (secured by pledge of first and refunding 5s), are selling at about 100 and interest, to yield 7 per cent.

The proceeds of this issue, with current surplus earnings, will provide for the completion of plant extensions now in progress at Detroit, Hartford, Providence, and Indianapolis.

To correct an apparent misunderstanding among shippers the Southern Pacific Company announces that its recent application for permission to operate its Atlantic steamship lines between points on the Atlantic seaboard and the Gulf Coast, which was denied by the Interstate Commerce Commission, had no reference to the regular Morgan Line service, but was merely a request to be allowed to render occasional service between outlying ports and New Orleans and Galveston, and also to render occasional service to the Port of Houston whenever there was tonnage in sight to warrant the run. The present Morgan Line service is not affected by this decision.

The most striking event in the financial world during the last month was the borrowing by the government of $400,000,000 on its certificates of indebtedness, paying 5½ per cent. on a part thereof and 6 per cent. on the balance, declares the Farmers and Merchants National Bank of Los Angeles in its monthly financial letter. The latter figure is the highest interest rate which the government has paid since the reconstruction days after the civil war. There have also been very large offerings of preferred stocks of industrial corporations and long-time bonds of these corporations and public utilities, while municipal incorporations have not been backward in bond issues. All of these demands have stiffened money rates. Interest no longer seems any object. Inducements by way of common stock at reduced figures are offered by some corporations to effect the sale of preferred stocks.

The demand for additional capital seems to be widespread and unlimited. Present interest rates being paid by industrial corporations, manufacturers, individuals, producers of either raw materials or manufactured goods are not going to reduce selling prices to consumers, but will add thereto, unless producers, manufacturers, and distributors are willing to do business on a smaller margin of profit than they have been enjoying. If mills close down, even partially, and industries slow up, interest rates will probably gradually recede, unless the demand for credit by public utilities and municipalities constantly increases.

There is a wave of extravagant spending on the part of state, county, and municipal governments sweeping the country which is without sense or reason. Public improvements should be suspended until conditions are better. Politics controls all of these expenditures and politics never listens to reason. Expediency, perpetuation in office of present office-holders, the placating of henchmen, the controlling of votes through public expenditures are the factors which control the action of most governing bodies of states, counties, and municipalities, just as they do those of the national government. The patient taxpayer no longer looks for either sanity or economy in government affairs. The debts of the states, counties, and municipalities of the United States have increased at a marvelous rate in the past two years. None of our governing officials stop at expense. Our forefathers, who built up this country, hesitated to make public improvements which required the creation of a bonded indebtedness. The present generation seems to welcome the chance to create such debts. It does not practice self-denial or economy. The result is alarming to any sane-minded person who contemplates the burdens of the future. The interest burdens now being imposed upon this country will weigh heavily upon future generations.

If our consumption of sugar does not exceed last year's total of about 4,500,000 tons we ought to have enough to last out the year and carry over 300,000 tons on January 1, 1921. This estimate, prepared by President Post of the National Sugar Refining Company, is, according to the Boston News Bureau, "based on the assumption that Cuba will not sell to Europe and countries other than the United States more than 800,000 tons, against 1,261,869 last year." Mr. Post's table of available supplies was published in the Brooklyn Eagle as follows:

	Tons.
Cuba crop present estimate.....	3,700,000
Less local consumption.....	200,000
Less exports to Canada, Europe, and elsewhere.....	800,000—1,000,000
	2,700,000
Carry-over of beet-sugar, Jan. 1, 1920....	250,000
New crop beet-sugar available in 1920 (crop estimate 700,000 tons).....	400,000
Louisiana sugar.....	200,000
Porto Rico.....	400,000
Hawaii.....	500,000
Santo Domingos, Philippines, Javas, South America and miscellaneous.....	450,000
Total.....	4,900,000
Less exports of refined from this country to Europe and elsewhere in 1920.....	300,000

Leaving available to United States.....4,600,000

The Boston News Bureau adds: "Mr. Post's figures indicate he believes exports from Cuba and Europe and countries other than the United States for remainder of the crop season will be little more than 150,000 tons. Such exports so far this year have been 648,302 tons, against 368,185 in corresponding period of 1919. Last year exports from Cuba to foreign countries were large in the latter part of the crop season. The 450,000 tons of Santa Domingo and outside sugars which be figures are available as United States supplies have been attracted here by the high prices."

The Secretary of the Treasury, under the authority of the act approved September 24, 1917, as amended, offers for subscription, at par and accrued interest, through the Federal Reserve Banks, treasury certificates of indebtedness, in two series, both dated and bearing interest from July 15, 1920, the certificates of Series B 1921 being payable on January 15, 1921, with interest at the rate of 3½ per cent. per annum payable semi-annually, and the certificates of Series T M 2-1921 being payable on March 15, 1921, and bearing interest at the rate of 3½ per cent. per annum.

Applications will be received at the Federal Reserve Banks.

Bearer certificates will be issued in denominations of $500, $1000, $5000, $10,000, and $100,000. The certificates of Series B 1921 will be issued without coupons. The certificates of Series T M 2-1921 will have one interest coupon attached, payable March 15, 1921.

The certificates of both said series shall be exempt, both as to principal and interest, from all taxation now or hereafter imposed by the United States, any state, or any of the possessions of the United States, or by any local taxing authority except (a) estate or inheritance taxes, and (b) graduated additional income taxes, commonly known as surtaxes, and excess-profits and war-profits taxes, now or hereafter imposed by the United States, upon the income or profits of individuals, partnerships, associations, or corporations. The interest on an amount of bonds and certificates authorized by said act approved September 27, 1917, and amendments thereto, the principal of which does not exceed in the aggregate $5000, owned by any individual, partnership, association, or corporation, shall be exempt from the taxes provided for in clause (h) above.

The certificates of these series do not bear the circulation privilege. The certificates of Series B 1921 will not be accepted in payment of taxes. The certificates of Series T M 2-1921 will be accepted at par, with an adjustment of accrued interest, during such time and under such rules and regulations as shall be prescribed or approved by the Secretary of the Treasury, in payment of income and profits taxes payable at the maturity of the certificates.

The right is reserved to reject any subscription and to allot less than the amount of certificates of either or both series applied for and to close the subscriptions as to either or both series at any time without notice. Payment at par and accrued interest for certificates allotted must be made on or before July 15, 1920, or on later allotment. After allotment and upon payment Federal Reserve Banks may issue interim receipts pending delivery of the definitive certificates. Any qualified depository will be permitted to make payment by credit for certificates allotted to it for itself and its customers up to any amount for which it shall be qualified in excess of existing deposits when so notified by the Federal Reserve Bank of its district. Treasury certificates of indebtedness of Series F 1920, maturing July 15, 1920, will be accepted at par, with an adjustment of accrued interest, in payment for any certificates of the Series B 1921 or T M 2-1921 now offered which shall be subscribed for and allotted.

As fiscal agents of the United States, Federal Reserve Banks are authorized and requested to receive subscriptions and to make allotment in full in the order of the receipt of applications up to amounts indicated by the Secretary of the Treasury to the Federal Reserve Banks of the respective districts.

Action by the United States treasury increasing the interest rate upon the $419,000,000 issue of certificates of indebtedness maturing January 3d and June 15th next to 5½ and 6 per cent. reflected the constantly advancing rates for money (says the Wells Fargo Nevada National Bank in their July monthly letter). At this investment basis the new government securities were quickly subscribed. During the first half of the year the railroads borrowed about $260,000,000 through the sale of short-term notes and bonds. The interest tions. It is hardly reasonable to suppose that these announcements will be unfavorable from the stock-market standpoint, and, as these overhanging factors doubtless have contributed to the public indisposition to buy, their favorable issue should encourage large public participation in the market.

Meantime there has been what is regarded in the Street as well-considered buying of railroad stocks by the important financial interests. The market for railway shares seems in position to advance rather sensationally, as current prices are actual panic levels as compared with markets of former years. rate for most of these loans was 7 per cent. and in many instances the securities were quickly disposed of. Industrial corporations also borrowed heavily at terms which meant a total cost to the borrower of from 7 to 9 per cent. for the accommodation. Further financing for the railroads, industrial companies, public utilities, states, municipalities, and various foreign governments will make the coming half-year rank as an unusually active investment period. The instant success of the Swiss government $25,000,000 bonds offering has helped the investment situation. This transaction emphasizes the potential demand for high-grade loans yielding 8 per cent. A long series of railroad and incorporation loans will be forthcoming soon if investment inquiries continue. The bond market still provides splendid opportunities for constructive investments and railroad shares are now quoted at about the lowest level touched for a quarter-century.

At the regular monthly meeting of the board of directors of the Seaboard National Bank Mortimer Fleishhacker, T. C. Tilden, and Louis Sutter—president, vice-president, and cashier respectively of the Anglo-California Trust Company—were elected members of the directorate of the Seaboard. Mr. Robert J. Tyson, president of the Seaboard, resigned because of ill-health and was succeeded as president by his brother, James Tyson, who is also president of the Charles Nelson Company and a director of the Anglo-California Trust Company.

Messrs. Fleishhacker, Tilden, and Sutter will serve on the board of the Seaboard until this institution is formally taken over by the Anglo-California Trust Company, which will be in about a month's time. An announcement was made in these columns a week ago of the purchase of the Seaboard National Bank by Mortimer Fleishhacker for the Anglo-California Trust Company. The Seaboard National Bank will be conducted as a branch of the Trust Company, but the same officers and employees will be retained. The only difference will be an enlarged service which the Trust Company will give to the business interests in the water-front district.

A striking new method of working has been introduced by the Anglo-South American Bank in order to cope with the rapid increase of its business. Although additional accommodation has been secured, it is still insufficient to meet the needs of the staff, and it has therefore been decided to try the experiment of working in two shifts so far as internal business is concerned. Under this new plan the working day will begin at 8 a. m. and terminate at 10 p. m., and two shifts will be at work in this period. Details of the plan have yet to be filled in, but the early and late shifts will alternate. The enterprising management of the bank deserves credit for inaugurating this new departure, which is certain to be followed with great interest by other banks similarly situated.—London Weekly Times.

The American Woolen Company was incorporated March 29, 1899, under the laws of New Jersey.

This great concern controls the woolen industry of the United States and owns fifty woolen mills, all of which are free from leases, bonds, or mortgages. The plants comprise more than 700 acres of land and the mill buildings, constructed chiefly of brick and stone, contain more than ten million square feet of floor space. These plants are located in Massachusetts, New York, Rhode Island,

New Hampshire, Vermont, Maine, Connecticut, and Kentucky. The company gives special attention to the needs of its employees, has adopted a plan for sick and accident benefits, builds homes, and has inaugurated a system of retail stores furnishing at cost to employees food, fuel, and clothing, etc.; also has recently increased their wages 15 per cent.

The New York World on May 13, 1920 stated that an investigation completed by the Department of Justice shows that the company made a net profit of $19,000,000 in the first quarter of 1920, or within $1,000,000 of the total common capitalization.

The range of price for the stock: high, 1919, 169½; low, July 14, 1920, 84½, a loss of 50 per cent. in price, entirely unwarranted by the following figures:

Current Assets, December 31, 1919—
Cash	$ 9,248,135
Accounts receivable	26,034,597
Inventories (cost prices)	52,990,146
Total	$88,272,878
Current liabilities	29,169,616

Net current assets, $59,103,262
Equal to $295 per share on the common stock.
The company's earnings (equiv. on common), 1919, 63 per cent.; 1918, 47 per cent.; 1917, 64 per cent.; 1916, 27 per cent. A total of 202 per cent. in four years; an amount in dollars and cents of $40,513,245, equal to $200 per share on common stock.

The surplus of the company, after most liberal deductions for depreciation, etc., was $31,734,427 December 31, 1919, equal to $160 per share, nearly double the price the stock is now selling at. Dividend rate on both common and preferred stock is 7 per cent. per annum. At present price the common stock nets 8 per cent. and is a wonderful speculative investment considering the potential value back of the stock.

Capital stock, par $100; common, $40,000,000, authorized $20,000,000 outstanding; preferred 7 per cent. cumulative $60,000,000, authorized $40,000,000 outstanding.

Sanford & Kelley of New Bedford in an analysis of the company issued in September, 1919, said the following regarding the book value of the common stock:

"The productive capacity and the number of plants operated have been doubled since the company was started. It is probable the company's plants have cost at least $75,000,000 and could not now be replaced for $150,000,000. Taking the book value of the plants, it offsets the outstanding preferred stock, leaving net quick assets of $53,812,721, or $270 per share on the common. If the value of the plants were taken at $100,000,000, figures more nearly representing the cost of replacement, it would give a book value for the common of $600, after deducting the preferred at par."

The Wall Street Journal, April 16, 1920, stated that President Wood had denied rumors of acquisition of control of the company by Du Pont interests. He said that the company has over 17,000 shareholders.—W. C. Gregg.

Recent declines in the prices of a few commodities are not to be regarded as isolated instances, but are part of a gradual and general movement that has been under way for a considerable time, the National Bank of Commerce in New York says in a discussion of current business conditions. The statement says in part:

"It has generally been conceded that prices would ultimately seek a lower level than that maintained during the war and immediately thereafter. Such decline has always followed the over-stimulation of commerce and industry produced by war. Under these circumstances, a downward price movement, if gradual and orderly, is to be welcomed both as an evidence of the return of more orderly conditions and as a factor in accomplishing that return. Such a movement in the prices of basic commodities is now clearly evident. Sharp recent declines in a few commodities, however, are likely to cause the business public to lose sight of the fact that in a number of other commodities a gradual decline has been under way for a considerable time. The prices of copper and zinc have been at low levels ever since the armistice. Hogs declined over $9 per hundred, or about 40 per cent., from July to December, 1919. Since that date they have recovered slightly, and have continued fairly steadily near their present level since January, 1920. The price of cattle declined from October, 1919, to May, 1920. The prices of best packer hides and No. 1 city calfskins have declined steadily and fairly regularly since August, 1919. Thus it will be seen that recent declines are not to be viewed as isolated instances, but as a part of a gradual and general movement, the time at which each commodity responds and the degree to which it is affected being determined by conditions in the national and international market for that specific commodity.

"Even at this time it is well to emphasize once more that the abnormal price level has been the result first, of actual physical shortage of goods in relation to demand, and second, of expansion in the volume of credit and the various forms of money. It is thus clear that a decline in prices can only be brought about by a falling off of demand, an increase in the physical volume of production, a decrease in the volume of credit and money, or by these and various other causes working together. The armistice automatically destroyed the specialized demand which the war had created, and removed the artificial support which had sustained the buying power of Europe during the conflict. While the stimulated domestic demand in the United States and elsewhere at first appeared to offset this, this influence could not possibly be permanent. In many lines consumption is not immediate, so that the rate of purchase after every abnormal period inevitably declines to a normal level or below it. It is primarily this tendency which has been reflected in the refusal of buyers to accept additional price increases, or indeed, to buy in undiminished volume at the levels which had prevailed for months.

"It was not to be expected that the industrial community could maintain the high tension under which it had worked during the war years, and it is very doubtful as to whether the maintenance of this tension would have been desirable. Despite numerous and widespread complaints as to the unsatisfactory condition of production in the United States, the fact remains that since the recovery from the temporary hesitation following the armistice, this country has increased production in certain directions. During May, American cotton mills consumed 541,080 running bales of cotton, an amount exceeded for the corresponding month in 1916, 1917, and 1918, but exceeding May consumption from 1913 to 1915, and 1919. Total consumption for the first five months of 1920 was 2,792,942 running bales, or at a rate of 6,700,000 bales per year. Returns for wool consumption are not available later than for April, when 66,900,000 pounds, grease equivalent, were used. It is certain that consumption for May and June will show a heavy decline. At the same time total consumption for 1919 was 622,218,000 pounds, grease equivalent, and for the first four months of 1920 the total was 272,000,000 pounds. Although exact data are not available prior to the war, annual consumption for the five fiscal years 1910-1914 averaged about 510,000,000 pounds per year, and consumption in 1917, the maximum year for the industry thus far, was 768,000,000 pounds. Bituminous coal production for May was a little over 38,000,000 short tons, and for the first 134 working days of 1920 it was 221,043,000 tons, compared with 184,004,000 tons for the same period in 1919, and 240,973,000 tons in 1918. While it is true that in many lines production in 1919 and thus far into 1920 has been against great odds, and in many cases disappointing, it is nevertheless true that production has been gradually filling up the gap between demand and supply, not only in the United States, but in every country in the world, except those yet in a state of internal disorder.

"In the face of these conditions, discernible to all far-seeing business men, the wisdom of further credit expansion became apparent some months ago. Efforts to prevent such expansion have resulted in a considerable strain on credit, and this has been much accentuated by retarded transportation and consequent tying up of a large volume of credit. At the same time, the fact must not be lost sight of that the credit position of the United States is essentially sound, and that there will be credit for enterprises prepared to cooperate intelligently in the work of bringing manufacturing, commercial, and financial operations to a stable and conservative basis.

"A factor not to be overlooked at the present time is the increasing unemployment. In some districts large numbers of men are out of work as a result of disorganized transportation. This effect has been especially noteworthy in the coal regions and in the great centres of automobile manufacture. Refusal of the public to accept increased prices, or even to maintain a volume of purchase equal to that of recent months at the level of prices then prevailing, has reacted sharply on some sections of the textile industry and on the garment trades. Considerable unemployment in these industries has resulted. If this is of brief duration, it need have no serious effects, but prolonged and widespread unemployment rapidly destroys buying power and produces social unrest, so that a far-seeing policy will indicate its avoidance if this is at all possible.

"The agricultural districts continue to suffer from labor shortage, but it is now believed that reasonably adequate help for the harvests will be secured. The agricultural outlook is on the whole quite favorable for the grain crops. However, a large part of the wheat crop is now in its most critical stage, and considerable variation from the present estimate is not unlikely. Corn is late through wide areas, but it is as yet too early to draw any conclusion as to the crop. The estimate of condition of cotton as 62.4 per cent. of normal, the lowest on record, is not of so

My Second Country.

Now that the first glamour of war enthusiasm has passed away we are beginning to see that the interior situation of France as it existed before 1914 and as it now exists in an accentuated form is by no means couleur de rose. No one knows more of France than Mr. Robert Dell. No one is more disposed to state the exact facts and the extent to which they have been emphasized and aggravated by war. Social maladies which were relatively innocuous or at least bearable five years ago may now assume the gravity of fatal diseases.

Mr. Dell speaks of the people of France, her institutions, and her problems. The French are strangely tolerant of abuses until they become intolerable and then they "smash up everything." They are tolerant of corruption in the official classes, of an exasperating caste system, of the incapacities of parliament, and of the iniquities of the police. Other peoples amend such evils in an orderly way. The French wait in patience and then do it by revolution. Mr. Dell seems to fear revolution in France.

Speaking of the lack of sanitation and the hardships inflicted upon the servant class, he makes the surprising statement: "All this continues because the propertied classes are the complete masters of France and not one of the bourgeois political parties dares to touch their pockets." The fatal weakness of the Frenchman is his love of money, and this causes him to be tolerant of corruption and maladministration. An eminent Frenchman said recently of his own people that they were "quite willing to let their sons be killed, but you mustn't ask them for five francs." As a matter of fact the French funds for war relief were pitifully small, wholly insignificant in proportion to the money subscribed in England. The wealthy classes have never been willing to pay their fair share of taxation, and not even the war changed their attitude. The French statesman is ignorant of economics, and we are told of Clemenceau that "his greatest admirer would not venture to say that he ever grasped even the elementary data of an economic problem or ever thought it worth while to try to do so."

Mr. Dell explodes the popular belief in a French religious revival. On the contrary, he says, there is intense resentment at the clerical coercion that has been exercised in the army and elsewhere, and the result has been the waning of the religious sentiment.

The author's survey is certainly not a cheerful one. His general attitude is one of foreboding, and if we may accept him as a reliable witness his foreboding is by no means unjustified.

MY SECOND COUNTRY (FRANCE). By Robert Dell. New York: John Lane Company; $2.

Jane McRae.

There are some heroines with whom we fall in love and some to whom we are a little indifferent. Jane McRae belongs to the latter category. We meet her first as the daughter of a country inn-keeper who makes of her a waitress and a drudge. Then come two suitors for her hand. Pendleton is a young engineer and unexceptionable in nearly every way. Gault is a boomer, a professional entertainer who is running the local "movie" theatre. Jane becomes engaged to Pendleton and then rejects him when she finds that he has not always been indifferent to the charms of other women. It would be strange if he had. Then Jane goes to New York, meets some of the usual vicissitudes, encounters Gault accidentally, and summarily marries him. Largely through his aid she becomes a picture star and then discovers, or rather realizes, that she does not love her husband and that she does love Pendleton, who is hovering around somewhere within convenient call. The story is undeniably interesting, so much so as to cause us momentarily to forget that no such girl as Jane McRae ever existed. But then, who cares anything about the probabilities of a novel.

What Happened in Europe.

It is well that the public demand should have called forth a new edition of Mr. Vanderlip's book on the condition of Europe. Written by a financier, it bears all the marks of statesmanship, and of that power of cautious and precise summary that is among the greatest needs of the day.

Mr. Vanderlip was charged with pessimism on the first appearance of his book. It is the common lot of all men in America who refuse to say that "all's right with the world." Mr. Vanderlip refused to say that all was right with Europe. On the contrary he said that a catastrophe was pending and that it could be averted only by the aid of America. Europe, he said, must be saved from a financial and economic breakdown that must react seriously upon ourselves. There were possibilities of a cataclysm and time moved rapidly. It would seem from Mr. Vanderlip's new preface that he is impenitent. He tells us that the greatest immediate danger is the possibility that the radical forces in Germany will gain control and that there will be some sort of coalition with Russia. Today comes the news that the Polish armies have been overwhelmed and that a Russian invasion of Germany is pending. In Russia there is a Red army of three million men. "A coalition of the military power of Russia with that of Germany, Russian military leadership being supplemented by German experience, would offer to the Entente a most difficult problem. If that coalition were ever found to include Japan, the whole world would be affected by the result. A coalition between Germany and Russia offers most disturbing possibilities." Such an eventuality is now much nearer than when Mr. Vanderlip wrote his new preface.

The Negro Faces America.

Some eminent writers have recently warned us of a certain stirring among the dark races of the world that augurs ill for an undisputed white supremacy. But we are apt to forget that the negro problem is an integral part of the larger movement and that it lies at our doors refusing to be indefinitely postponed. Is the negro an American citizen, and, if so, can he be denied forever the rights of citizenship, the rights of democracy, the right of justice, and the right to live? These were once academic questions that the negro himself did not discuss. But that time has passed. The negro has become coherent, organized, and audible. He has his newspapers and his intelligent leaders. And he has the numbers that make such a combination formidable.

Such are some of the problems discussed by Mr. Herbert J. Seligmann in his present volume. He asks us to look at the facts and to be sure that we have the facts. Contempt speedily degenerates into hate, and from hate comes vilification. Have we been too quick to adopt a set of axioms with regard to the negro and to apply them indiscriminately and without regard to the truth? Have our newspapers been too ready to sustain any assertion so long as it is a popular one? For example, is the negro actually so guilty in sex matters as we have been led to believe? Has he not often been called upon to suffer where the blame should actually be laid upon the white woman?

Mr. Seligmann surveys the whole field and he does it with moderation and restraint. He warns us that we can not close our eyes much longer. The race riots in Northern cities are reminders that a definite solution must be found, not the solution of the easy axiom, but a solution that shall satisfy the negro that he is in very truth a citizen in fact as well as in name.

Briefer Reviews.

A hook to delight the heart of the angler is "Trout-Fishing in Brooks," by G. Garrow-Green. It is the work of an experienced sportsman who has made a special study of this branch of the craft and knows its technicalities as well as its pleasures. The author gives instructions for the use of fly, worm, and minnow, elucidated by pictures and diagrams, together with many valuable suggestions of a more general character. His hook is published by E. P. Dutton & Co. ($2).

Boni & Liveright have published a volume entitled "Albany: The Crisis in Government," being the "history of the suspension, trial, and expulsion from the New York State Legislature in 1920 of the five Socialist assemblymen by their political opponents." Charles Evans Hughes said of this expulsion: "I regard it as a serious blow at the standards of true Americanism, and nothing short of a calamity." The author is Louis Waldman, and an introduction is contributed by Seymour Stedman. The price is $1.50.

Invisible Light in War.

When a source of light is put at the principal focus of a converging lens, the emergent beam consists of parallel rays, and consequently does not change in cross-section as it proceeds, according to a discussion in the proceedings of the Physical Society of London. Often the narrowness of such a beam prevents it being observed. Greater accuracy was attained by using a filter, which permitted only the extreme red rays to issue. These would be invisible to an observer unless he protected his eyes from daylight by a similar screen. Through such a screen only the red light would penetrate and the eyes of the observer would be in a sensitive state owing to the exclusion of ordinary light. By such an arrangement secret signals can be transmitted. A variation of the method was the use of a screen transmitting only ultra-violet light,

How Presidents Are Made.

Really a history of the national series of presidential elections, this title is meant to show the real forces that are influential in electing our Presidents. The author of this small volume, Arthur Wallace Dunn, a well-known Washington correspondent, and therefore familiar with the political atmosphere of the capital, shows in this brief history how rarely Presidents are elected upon questions of national policy, and how much personality and opportunity have to do with the result.

The recent selection of the candidates by the two parties renders the volume particularly timely, more especially because of the more widespread interest felt in the coming election and the questions involved.

From this volume the voter may learn why our past Presidents were chosen over other men. The author has given more space, however, to the last third of the century because many of the political questions of that era still remain unsolved and are present-day problems.

Mr. Dunn has presented all his matter in a tone of careful impartiality, his wide acquaintance with public men enabling him to do full justice to the subjects they have dealt with, and the book is very readable.

HOW PRESIDENTS ARE MADE. By Arthur Wallace Dunn. New York: Funk & Wagnalls Company; 75 cents.

A Dog Book.

"Dumb-Bell of Brookfield" is the tale of a champion setter, who, like the ugly duckling, had a humble beginning only to soar to unexpectedly lofty flights as a champion field setter. The author, John Taintor Foote, knows about champions and their points. He loves the irresistible heasties, and as he also loves humanity, his book is pleasant reading, for it not only expresses warm-heartedness, but humor.

An enjoyable feature in the book is the character of Peter, head kennel man at Brookfield, the big country home where Dumb-Bell's master and owner lived and, with his dainty wife, loved life and the dogs, and enjoyed the sayings of Peter.

Peter is an English-trained kennel man whose whole soul is in dogdom. Peter's dropped aitches do not interfere with the racy eloquence of his speech, and even those readers who know nothing of the kennels of the rich and the high-class beauties who inhabit them can not but enjoy Peter's comments on his charges, as well as the kindly atmosphere of camaraderie between him and his master and mistress.

Limbo.

Mr. Aldous Huxley unquestionably knows how to write a short story, although whether his yarns will be acceptable to our modern pruderies is somewhat open to doubt. There is a certain robust candor about his work that either attracts or repels the reader, but that certainly will not leave him indifferent. In this little volume we have seven of Mr. Huxley's short stories dealing in the main with the exuberances of youth, although there is one at the end of the book of a quite different calibre. It relates to the murder of the old alchemist, Nicholas Flamel, and the story is told with something more than conventional dignity.

A War Comparison.

Professor Gilbert Murray writes a scholarly little volume that may be said to have for its text the old adage that "history repeats itself." He draws a comparison between the late war and the great struggle between Athens and Sparta. Both conflicts involved the whole of civilization. In both cases there were profiteering, pacifism, espionage, restrictions of liberty, demagogic appeals, and corruption. Indeed with a few changes of names and terminology one could hardly distinguish between the two stories so far as the above features are concerned. Philosophical historians will find much that is worthy of study in this little sketch by a writer so eminently qualified to deal with such a topic.

For Community Players.

Those interested in community plays and the best and easiest way to give them should on no account overlook this practical volume by Roy Mitchell. Mr. Mitchell is anxious that Shakespeare shall be acted and he shows us that the task is by no means too ambitious for community players.

Mr. Mitchell has taken nothing for granted, except that the acting of Shakespeare has an educational value. He begins at the beginning and tells exactly how to choose the play, how to organize the company, how to plan and carry out rehearsals, how to set the stage for different plays, how to make cheaply and yet effectively the furniture and accessories, how to design and make the costumes, how to manage the lighting, how to do the make-up, and how to provide suitable music.

Mr. Mitchell also makes some general suggestions on the theory of acting and stage directing which might give many a professional man of the theatre much to think about.

The book is especially addressed to community actors, and the one-man idea is steadily discouraged throughout.

The Power of Mind.

This volume was first published in 1902 and it now makes a new appearance with corrections and emendations. Psychic research and a general widespread interest in matters occult have largely familiarized us with the theories advanced by Mr. Ingalese and borrowed by him from ancient sources which are not always acknowledged. He would have been well advised to omit those portions of his work that seem likely to stimulate avarice and cupidity and equally likely to disappoint both. Mr. Ingalese writes with clarity and conciseness. Whether the book was worth writing is another matter.

Gossip of Books and Authors.

When word of the death of William Dean Howells came to the Booksellers' Convention at Philadelphia, the proceedings were stopped while every member of the gathering arose for a minute in silent tribute to the memory of the dean of American letters.

William Lyon Phelps discusses most interestingly in the New York Times Book Review Van Wyck Brooks' "The Ordeal of Mark Twain," lately published by E. P. Dutton & Co. Professor Phelps does not agree with the thesis that Mr. Brooks presents, but says that "the book is packed with ideas," and adds that "many hooks have been written about Mark Twain, but, with the exception of Paine's biography, this work by Mr. Van Wyck Brooks is the most important and most essential."

We read in "Talks with T. R." (a book compiled from diaries kept by John J. Leary, Jr., through a long intimacy with Roosevelt and just published by the Houghton Mifflin Company) many of the bursts of opinions and illuminating incidents which were such a characteristic phase of the great man. The following is a glimpse of him in Berlin in 1910: "It is," said he, "not generally known that I had a little friction with the Kaiser when I visited Germany. When I reached Berlin I found an invitation for 'Mr. Roosevelt' to be the Kaiser's guest at Potsdam. Mrs. Roosevelt was traveling with me. I asked at the embassy what the invitation meant—if it included her. When I found it did not I declined, and said I was stopping at the embassy. The invitation was repeated. My answer was that Mrs. Roosevelt and I were to be the guests of the embassy. I was traveling as any American gentleman might travel with his wife and I did not propose to go any place where she would not be welcomed or could not go. The next day 'Colonel and Mrs. Roosevelt' were invited. By maintaining my point I had made it."

RIO, THE LUXURIOUS.

Rio de Janeiro, the princess city of Brazil, is the city of luxury and easy spending, the intellectual, literary, political, and social centre of this immense country of over three million square miles of territory. There are a dozen great regions in Brazil where widely differentiated industries earn money—the rubber and hardwood areas of the Amazon, the oil-nut and fibre country of the great promontory, the sugar and tobacco and cotton lands of Pernambuco and her neighbors, the cacao groves of Bahia, the ore mountains of Minas Geraes, the coffee, cattle, pinewood, and maté states farther south, the vast industrial centres of S. Paulo; but Rio remains the chief place where money is spent.

Altogether, the population of the capital is counted at a million and a quarter, and there are plain evidences of prosperous growth in the long additions to the fine roads of the environs. Since I was last in Rio, three years ago, the sea road beside the Atlantic has been extended several miles to the foot of the towering Gavea, and scores of luxurious, often bizarre, houses have risen beside it, with many new roads running inland. In every suburb construction is going on rapidly, unlimited quantities of building stone being available from the quarries of the city.

All the main streets of Rio are splendidly asphalted, decorated with double or triple rows of palms or other perennially green trees, with wide mosaic pavements, and brilliantly lighted. At night, when the Southern Cross swings overhead in a deep blue sky that never seems to become quite dark, and every one motors along the favorite seven or eight miles of seashore, Rio is a sparkling city, with tens of thousands of public lights reflected in the waters of the bay and the Atlantic.

All that the prodigal hands of Nature and the sedulous tools of man can do to make Rio beautiful has been done. It is true that in common with all cities of the Americas Rio reflects Europe, but with a transparent atmosphere, the use of electricity for almost all civic purposes, and a genial climate, she is able to adorn herself with a coquetry forbidden to coal-ridden communities.

In early December, South Brazil is in the first stages of summer, and quantities of shrubs and flowering trees are in full bloom in the public parks and gardens. Brilliant masses of scarlet flame against the red-tiled roofs, the strange deep crimson blossoms of the mahogany trees carpet the ground; quantities of little trees drip with bright yellow sprays that at a few yards' distance appear to be laburnums, acacias are gay with cream and rose and lemon-tinted flowers; canna lilies, roses, plumbago, honeysuckle, hydrangeas, and salvias are in full bloom, and tropic creepers throw white trumpets or magenta petals or trails or airy blossoms, bright pink or mauve over every wall.

The fruit shops are full of pineapples from Pernambuco, the big seedless oranges and figs—together with grapes, pears, and apples imported from Spain and Portugal, the latter being sold in the hotels at the modest price of about 2s each.

Although in summertime the diplomatists are in the hills and the capital is supposed to be empty, it is today actually full of life and gaiety, visibly prosperous and light-hearted. The large favorable trade balance of 1919, continuing the prosperity of the last few years, and the high prices at which coffee has been recently sold, have created a feeling of confidence which the violent fluctuations of exchange during the last three or four weeks have not yet affected. There is a great deal of movement in the business districts, shops and warehouses are full of expensive merchandise, and the chief shopping areas, as the Avenida Rio Branco, the Rua do Ouvidor, the Goncalves Dias and Uruguyana, are crowded all the time.

The impression left upon one's mind after an hour spent in these streets, before the fashionable tea time, is of hundreds of magnificent motor-cars, the sparkling of many jewels, the fluttering of the chiffon and silk dresses of pretty little dolls of women. The new hotels are thronged with guests, the dance-tea has become an institution, and every corner has its cinema house, almost invariably showing North American films.

While everybody discusses with passion the rise in exchange and its effect upon commerce, even the merchants whose care it is to appear eternally pessimistic grumble with certain restraint. It is agreed that should the value of the milreis remain at its present height of about 17 pence the export of Brazilian raw materials must be most seriously affected, but the commercial community appears to think that the year will see a marked drop.—London Times.

"THE FIREFLY."

It is beginning to dawn upon such of us as are in town that such of us as are out of town are losing something extra choice in the theatrical line. The New Bostonians make up an excellent organization in themselves, and when you add a prima donna of Mabel Riegelman's standing and attainments we have something quite out of the ordinary. By which I am referring to the musical and histrionic qualifications of the organization, and not to the, to us at least, very decided novelty of witnessing a high-class musical comedy sung and played in high-class style. That, of course, has always been the specialty of the Bostonians, old or new, but it is a specialty that we have not enjoyed here for a long time.

I can not say that, as a general thing, there is much profit or pleasure to be derived from the average musical-comedy show. It is of the frothy frothy, and without a personality in it is time wasted. But "The Firefly" isn't only a show. It goes like light opera, for Friml's music has class, and the entire performance is excellently mounted, stage-managed, sung, and acted.

In "The Prince of Pilsen" performance I noticed that, thoroughly enjoyable though it was, it had not the same high polish that time and practice had put on "The Chocolate Soldier." But "The Firefly" has evidently been most carefully rehearsed, and everything—choruses, dances, stage tableaux, and the admirable work of the principals—went on oiled wheels.

"The Firefly," the hook of which is by Otto Harbach, is the kind of composition that ranks with "The Merry Widow." The story has any amount of humor, romance, sentiment, suspense. It is charmingly told, and the freshness, gayety, and expressive quality of the music makes it seem like opera bouffe, although it is really musical comedy.

It just happens, although she has repeatedly sung at the Curran, that I had never heard Mabel Riegelman, and the tiny prima donna was to me a delightful surprise. Not only is her lovely voice a fountain of varied and beautiful expression, but her whole being radiates the feeling to which her song is giving vent. She is a born singer, a horn actress, a horn comedienne. And to be a comedienne, a real comedienne, infers being also an actress of sentiment and intrinsic sincerity. Mabel Riegelman seems to have everything but actual beauty, and so sparkling and changeable is her countenance, so varied and enchantingly natural and vivid the expressions that are perpetually replacing each other on her mobile features, that one would far, far rather look upon her than upon the average beauty. And not only are her features, her attitudes, her song rich with the changing moods she so beautifully interprets, but she puts into the utterance of her lines the same sparkle and felicity of expression. Although there is a certain incongruity between her tiny doll's body and her face, so full of character and originality, yet her miniature size made it seem as if the piece had been written with her in mind. The true artist always lends his qualifications to the character portrayed, but to many lights of the operatic stage it would have been difficult, indeed impossible, to assume the rôle of a hoy of from twelve to fourteen: a small, lovable imp who was always in mischief, and who was, in temperament, up to playing the boyish pranks that made men, recalling the playtime of their lives, look upon the engaging little hit of mischief indulgently.

So naturally, except for that unavoidable femininity of contour that can not be concealed, did Mabel Riegelman carry off her gamin scenes that she almost persuaded her audience into accepting her as a hoy; a small, lively, irrepressible urchin who fairly huddled with the joy of life. And then, when she donned petticoats, she was all womanly, the very essence of feminine feelings, a vessel of quivering emotions.

And the entire company played up to her. It was very evident that they were intensely interested in the performance of the tiny diva, and no doubt many of them were at one and the same time performers and delighted spectators. It was noticeable in the last act, while the prima donna was brilliantly rendering the interpolated "Prima Vera," that the company, which was representing a gathering of guests listening, at a home of ostentatious wealth, to a famous singer, did not need to act in order to express the feelings of interest and pleasure that were supposed to animate the assemblage.

The company, as I have intimated, is selected for its musical and histrionic ability, with due heed to good looks. There are a number of pretty girls in the company, and the personnel of the male chorus is superior to the average. Leslie Leigh, the widow in "The Prince of Pilsen," also has a prominent rôle in "The Firefly." Her voice is fresh and sweet, she acts well, and she had a chance to show her capabilities in "Sympathy," in which she and J. Humbird Duffey captured the house. Mr. Duffey's natural attractiveness had full sway in the rôle of a slightly grizzled but quite irresistible man of the world.

Edward Quinn had another romantic rôle, and the sweet and pleasant tenor of the one and the virile baritone of the other gave great pleasure.

Jefferson De Angelis, who is evidently a man of parts, since the production was under his direction, always plays as a consistent character comedian. We need never yield him any but legitimate laughter, for in his methods he never resorts to mere buffoonery; but his humor is so genuine, so unforced, and so provocative of mirth that to recall his performance is to yield to reminiscent laughter.

Both he and Marie Horgan have the gift of naturalness, which always makes a flash of humor go a much longer way.

Detmar Poppin this week has a more serious rôle, in which he quite shone as a gentle and lovable old choirmaster on the point of adopting little Tony and making him a great tenor, only to find his affections cruelly lacerated when the trousered sprite was transformed to an inconveniently winsome girl. Mr. Poppin gave that flavor of artistry to his impersonation which gave a keener edge to the pleasure of the spectators when Nina's boyish fun was over, and she learned that to be a woman again might mean sorrow, suspicion, and banishment.

Dorothy Elton, sweet in voice and looks, was one of the pretty ornaments of the stage. Lavinia Winn, a pretty, graceful girl with a champagne temperament, was another. "The girl with the feet," we called her, because of the trippiness with which those dainty members always shared in Sazette's exuberant moods. With Sam A. Burton—who was capital as a black-haired Italian valet with an accent and lots of Latin vivacity—as a dancing partner, the pair gave such manifest pleasure to the enjoying spectators that their recall meant that they had made something of a hit.

There are any number of pretty numbers in "The Firefly," of which "Love is like a firefly," sung by Mabel Riegelman, made a melodious refrain throughout the three acts. "When a maid comes knocking at your heart" is a pretty mingling of the two moods of the play. "Sympathy" and "Beautiful Ship from Toyland" are two other prominent favorites, but the fact is there are no dull passages either in the book or the music of the play, which unrolls as if both writer and composer had done their work when life looked happy, hopeful, and exhilarating.

"PEG O' MY HEART."

Every now and then the painful realization comes to us in America that we do not know how to pronounce English names. Our robust Americans, while consorting in Britain with the Britons, have inflicted terrible blows on British sensibilities, such as, for instance, dumping the contents of a boiled egg on a dish. My, aint it awful! And when we occasionally learn a new—to us—pronunciation of a hitherto mispronounced English name we are apt to feel that we have made a distinct advance in, well, say belles lettres. Only it is terribly discouraging, as we Americans seem by instinct to pronounce the majority of the English names radically different from the way they say them in the British Isles. Marjoribanks, for instance, and Cholmondeley: what traps they are for the unwary. We have mastered them long since, but much good that does us, for nearly every three-syllabled English name is a trap, and our education in respect to a good, high-class, high-sounding British name always remains uncompleted. Therefore we drew a sigh of relief in "Peg o' My Heart" when we learned to round another dangerous reef by discovering that, correctly pronounced, Chichester rhymes with "rich sister."

The Chichesters are the haughty patricians in "Peg o' My Heart" who deride, and despise, and snub red-haired Peg, who has arrived from New York with a choice assortment of newspaper packages, a "just plain dog," mussy curls, and a costume of dubious cut. Peg is really a lihel on New York. If Peg had been the real thing her red hair would have been done in the very latest style; you know—the way the girls do it up in the candy stores. She might have come from a slum tenement, but somehow she would have a tailor suit of more fashionable cut than is allowed by the author, and when the toploftical Chichesters began to snub her Peg, haughtily fingering the hair protuberances over her ears at frequent intervals, while in between she polished the finger-nails of one hand on the back of the other, or pushed a stray hair tendril under her hair net, Peg, in her best department-store manner—you know, as they do when the humble purchaser finds that the article called for is not within her means—now let's see, what's the subject of this sentence? Oh, yes, it's Peg, the unconquerable; Peg, then, would reduce them there sassy swells to such humbled mince-meat that they would crawl out of their exclusive drawing-room on all fours, leaving her all the honors of victory.

But J. Hartley Manners was writing a nice little sentimental appeal to that old-fashioned tradition—the tradition on which all melodramas are based—that all the virtues are in the poor and all the cussedness in the rich. There's a lot in it—for the drama, I mean. Even such a realist and master-craftsman as Pinero has used it. It works well, and the Alcazar audiences of the week are responding with soft hearts and sympathetic laughter to red-headed Peg's Irish beguilements.

Peg and "me father"—who never appears—belong to the stage Irish; that hoarily traditional collection of limber-tongued, quick-witted, tender-hearted, loyal-souled, chronically impecunious gentry who, George Bernard Shaw insists, exist purely in the imagination.

But J. Hartley Manners writes for non-realists. He had two things in mind while getting up the play: one the personality of his wife, Laurette Taylor. The other the kind of public that is firmly welded to the tradition of the stage Irishman—or Irishwoman.

Peg's invisible father represents one and Peg the other. The Chichester family represents the idle and anathematized rich. Jerry is forgiven for being a baronet and rich because he shows, not only a warm appreciation for Peg's humble charms and virtues, but a courteous indifference to the Chichester womenfolk. And so strong is the tradition, in

The men in our Service Department often quote that old proverb in connection with leaking faucets.

Out of a large experience, these men submit the following for your consideration:

"Watch your faucets.

"Watch them even if they only leak drop by drop.

"It is true that a faucet leaking drop by drop does not waste much water.

"It may cost you only half a mill a day—less than $2.00 a year.

"That's a trifle, of course.

"But a defective faucet does not continue to leak drop by drop for a year—or for a month.

"Faucet leakage gets steadily and rapidly worse.

"Almost before you notice, the faucet that leaked drop by drop is leaking a steady stream.

"Instead of costing you half a mill a day it now costs you half a dollar, a dollar, or even more.

"At the end of the month you find that you are paying more for water wasted than for water beneficially used.

"It is easy to fix a leaking faucet—all it needs is a new washer."

In pointing the moral of all this, the men in our Service Department take liberties with the old proverb, thus:

"A washer in time saves money."

drama of this class, that the rich are no good that I felt quite a jolt of simple-minded amazement when the fatuous Alaric showed affection for his mother and kissed her or patted her hand.

Mr. Manners indulges without shame in the old convention that people can turn around suddenly, as did Ethel, at the last, toward Peg. However, on the whole he has been rather more reasonable than one might expect in several particulars, and he has succeeded in writing a play enshrining a character that has captured the popular heart.

This character—that of Peg—staled though it might be with frequent repetition, Inez Ragan portrays with a thorough-going, wholesome heartiness that makes it seem almost fresh and new. She made of Peg such a vigorous, independent-minded young Hebe that the sentimental side of the character did not obtrude. The brogue, too, had a fine Irish flavor, and altogether Miss Ragan managed to bring her and Peg's personality into very harmonious concord.

Mrs. Emelie Melville, silk-trained and lace-lapped, represented the formidable aunt of the unwelcome stranger with a full complement of the terrifying suggestion attached to the person of the blameless British matron of wealth and social station.

Emily Pinter effectively emphasized the coldness and aversion of Peg's inaccessible cousin, and Ben Erway stressed successfully the general helplessness, combined with fatuous self-satisfaction, of Cousin Alaric. Dudley Ayres merely had to be a pleasant and kind friend to Peg, who so severely relegated to Coventry. Rafael Brunetto, who has been having lots of training in a variety of rôles, is now established in the favor of a public aware of his conscientious work; he appeared as the lawyer. Brady Kline as Brent, a sort of near-villain, was well played, and Al Cunningham and Jean Oliver played the rôles of the well-starched butler and the derisive maid.

Altogether a very satisfactorily presented representation of a play long popular, and now, probably, soon to be retired in favor of later successes.

JOSEPHINE HART PHELPS.

Firing a test shot with its barrel full of water was the unusual performance of an improved form of gun for shooting a life line over a wrecked vessel in recent official trials (says the Popular Mechanics Magazine). A one-piece shell containing powder and projectile gives the new gun a great advantage over the old muzzle-loading type. The barrel may be regulated to elevations of 30, 45, 60, or 80 degrees, and its range is 1700 feet. The barrel is readily carried by one man, and the one-piece carriage has a pair of wheels for easy hauling. The firing mechanism is actuated by a lanyard, and the life line, attached to the projectile, unwinds from the centre of the reel without kinking.

The Columbia Theatre.

The New Bostonians at the Columbia Theatre will bring to a close their season at the Columbia Theatre with a superb revival of the most delightful romantic opera of all time, "The Bohemian Girl." This is perhaps the most popular of all the lighter operas and its numbers have been sung so often in public and in private that every one is familiar with the principal features of the score, notably "Then You'll Remember Me," "I Dreamt I Dwelt in Marble Halls," "A Heart Bowed Down," and "Gipsy Life." The production of "The Bohemian Girl" will have an ideal cast. Mabel Riegelman will be heard in the rôle of Orline. Others in the cast are J. Humbird Duffey, Clara Irene Gray, Marie Horgan, Edward Quinn, Detmar Poppin. Matinees are announced for Wednesday and Saturday.

The Curran Theatre.

Oliver Morosco's latest musical-comedy success, with Charlotte Greenwood as the star, will begin the fourth and last week of its engagement tomorrow night at the Curran Theatre. "Linger Longer Letty" is a sequel to "So Long Letty," the famous song-and-dance show in which the monumental comedienne was last seen here.

This is a better show than "So Long Letty," mainly because it offers Miss Greenwood a more generous opportunity. She is on the stage most of the time, but not enough to satisfy the audiences. The rôle she plays is that of a household drudge who, being left at home from a party by her selfish sisters, gets angry and goes on a strike.

Miss Greenwood is ably supported by Robert Higgins, who makes an excellent foil for Miss Greenwood's quicker antics. The music that goes with the comedy is tuneful. The "Linger Longer Letty" song has a slow haunting cadence not easily forgotten.

The Alcazar Theatre.

From the laughter and pathos of "Peg o' My Heart" the players of the New Alcazar next Sunday will turn to the American comedy, "A Tailor Made Man." Its hero, plucky, resourceful, highly charged with the magnetic force that gives to youngsters the power to conquer obstacles, is a clothes-presser through necessity. While ironing out the creases in a plutocrat's "dress suit" it occurs to him that he would like to be a plutocrat himself, just to see how it feels. Calmly arraying himself in borrowed finery he invades a fashionable function financed by 17 cents of his own and a fifty-dollar bill that he finds in the purloined vest pocket. He is a swift worker and quickly rises to dizzy eminence in high society and big business. Keen wit and smart satire are hilariously blended in the novel play, which enjoyed extraordinary success here as in the East. It requires the largest cast assembled in years at the Alcazar—some twenty-five speaking characters. Dudley Ayres personates John Paul Bart; Inez Ragan, fascinating Tanya, the tailor's daughter; Alfred Hesse, of Ethel Barrymore's New York company, the foreign Dr. Sonntag, and Henry Shumer, the gentle old tailor, with Emily Pinter, Jean Oliver, Gladys Emmons, Eunice Gilman, Grace Finnell, Brady Kline, Ben Erway, Rafael Brunetto, Al Cunningham, and the standard favorites heavily reinforced.

"Fair and Warner," due Sunday, August 1st, is fast and furious frivolity. It has never before been staged at the Alcazar.

The Orpheum.

A bill especially heavy with notable headliners is scheduled to appear at the Orpheum Sunday. "Rubeville," Jack Wyatt and his Scotch lads and lassies, Solly Ward and company, Irene Franklin with Bert Green, and the "Creole Fashion Plate" constitute the lineup of celebrities.

"Rubeville" depicts rural life as it was before the day when autos took a firm hold on the farming districts. Harry B. Watson and Reg B. Merville will continue to depict rubes in the nightly assemblage around the cross-roads grocery store. The silver cornet band will continue to be an attraction.

Jack Wyatt's Scotch lads and lassies will interpret dances direct from their native country. These numbers will be flavored with sufficient American style and dash to render them doubly fast and fitted for vaudeville.

A satirical comedy, "Babies" will be depicted by Solly Ward, a Sam Bernard sort of comedian, and Marion Murray. How a quarreling married couple were held together by a flock of babies from an orphanage will be revealed.

Irene Franklin and the "Creole Fashion Plate" will remain for one more week.

Jim and Marian Harkins will talk about their neighbors in their bright turn in which gossip is the keynote of their fun. Francis Yates and Gus Reed in "Double Crossing," Jeanette Childs, and Bert and Hazel Skatelle in a surprising dancing novelty are the other newcomers. Pictorial weekly events, topics of the day, and the Orpheum orchestra are other attractions.

Anderson's "Frivolities."

San Francisco has paid homage to G. M. Anderson's "Frivolities of 1920" as the most brilliant revue ever brought here from New York. The management of the Columbia Theatre has arranged to offer the production for a run of two weeks, commencing with Monday night, August 2d. The immense stage of the Columbia Theatre will allow for the complete New York and Chicago presentation of the revue, all the many handsome stage settings and dozens of costumes being used to the best possible advantage and with excellent display. Some new features will be introduced for the Columbia Theatre engagement and all the old favorites will be seen and heard.

Antonio Scotti.

Antonio Scotti will appear here with a company of 150 from the Metropolitan Opera House the week beginning October 4th at the Exposition Auditorium.

Mr. Scotti is in the prime of his powers and abilities, and never has he sung or acted with greater effect than during the recent season of the Metropolitan Opera, where he appeared in a round of his leading rôles to the undiminished delight of his countless admirers in New York.

Seen at the Metropolitan Opera House, Mr. Scotti did not seem in the least oppressed by the weight of his managerial cares and responsibilities, but looked and spoke like a man of uncommon energy and action. The best of good fellows, there is no more popular figure at the Metropolitan Opera before or behind the curtain, and he carries the good-will of all his associates as a full-fledged impresario.

BUDAPEST VS. VIENNA.

Conditions at Vienna and Budapest, formerly the proud capitals of the Hapsburg Empire, but now reduced by defeat to misery and insignificance, are compared by the correspondent of a London paper. He writes:

"If it was always easy to draw a contrast between Vienna and Budapest the task today is easier than ever. The two cities are now spiritually the antithesis the one of the other, with the balance, so far as material comforts are concerned, heavily in favor of Budapest.

"The casual stranger coming to Vienna would not, perhaps, realize at first into what a plight the city has fallen. So long as he remains in the wealthy quarters of the town he will find shops still stocked with furs, jewelry, leatherwork goods, and the hundred and one articles of luxury that one finds only in a proud capital; he will find the opera and theatres in full swing; he will find the same crowds in the countless cafés, the same luxurious hotels. But disillusionment comes quickly.

"When I left Vienna three days ago the population was undergoing a reduced weekly ration which allotted 1027 grams (about two pounds) of bread and 125 grams (one-fourth pound) of cooking flour to hard workers, and 587 grams (a little over one pound) of bread and 125 grams of cooking flour to other people. The children even of well-to-do people apply to be fed at the kitchens instituted by the American and other charitable missions.

"Nourishing food is the universal desideratum. To quote a personal experience: I brought with me to Vienna a year ago several tins of dripping, some of which I have employed as dubbin on the leaky paper shoes that one buys there in exchange for equally worthless paper money. An Austrian friend was horrified at such profusion, and, acting on his hint, I now find that if one wants to see an official quickly or get anything done, a tin of dripping has all the persuasive eloquence of the sovereigns which Sherlock Holmes used to handle abstractedly before dilatory hansom cab drivers.

"In Budapest the food conditions are distinctly better. Such rationing as exists is more honored in the breach than in the observance. Meatless days are unknown, and if the poor do not get a regular supply of bread, and if sugar and potatoes are practically unobtainable, the workmen are somehow obtaining a sufficiency of vegetables and other farm products.

"In Vienna one can not walk fifty yards down the Ring without being accosted by beggars. Apart from war cripples, I have never yet seen a beggar in Budapest. This fact is significant of the entirely different spirit animating the two countries today. The Austrian is utterly down and out. He appears to have no energy left except to sit in cafés and read the newspapers during the daytime and to listen to music in the same cafés during the evening.

"With very few exceptions the government is equally spineless, and the conditions in general are not unlike what obtained here under the Karolyi régime. The provinces are in no mood to aid a capital where the soldiers and workmen's councils have long instituted a system of Bolshevism au lait, and if Vienna avoids falling into the same abyss as did Budapest it will be due more to the apathy even of the revolutionaries than to any energetic counter measure of their opponents.

"Budapest is in a very different frame of mind. The reaction from Bolshevism and the departure of the Roumanians have induced a strongly national, even a chauvinistic, temper among the people. Sensible, clear-thinking men, such as the prime minister, M. Huszar, or Admiral Horthy, may see well enough what is in Hungary's interest, but large sections of people, including even business men, speak freely of the inevitable revanche against the Roumanians and of the certitude that the Slovaks will soon come back again automatically to Hungary.

"One should not, perhaps, take this exaltation too seriously, but it can not have escaped notice that among the conditions of recognition of the Huszar government Sir George Clerk laid down that the Hungarians were to abstain from making any attack upon their neighbors and were to respect the provisional boundaries of the country pending the final delimitation by the peace conference. The conclusion of peace and the restoration of normal conditions with a democratically elected Parliament will doubtless do much to turn men's minds into more peaceful channels, but an impartial observer is bound to record the present national excitement and even to admire the elasticity of temperament which can so quickly recover from three months of enemy occupation superimposed upon the long months of Bolshevism under Count Karolyi and Bela Kun."

A Chinese government representative who was new to American ways came to the home of an eminent New York banker for a week's visit. It was winter, but he came without baggage, and yet every day he appeared at dinner with a change of garments. At first his hostess wondered how he managed it, but soon she discovered that his body was his trunk, and that instead of putting his clothes into a trunk, he put his trunk into his clothes. His garments were like the layers of an onion, except that any layer might be worn on the outside, and as some of his gowns—for such they might be called—were of silk, lined with fur, or fur lined with silk, he could wear them either side out, at will.

VANITY FAIR.

What ought to be done with the possessions of a king who has been ousted—"fired," if we may permit ourselves to use the language of the street? Doubtless there are historical precedents if one only had time to search for them. A good many kings have been dropped by the wayside in the checkered course of human affairs, but generally an Amurath has succeeded an Amurath, and the new ruler has willingly, even eagerly, assumed the revenues of his predecessor. But there are very few instances where a monarchy has given place to a republic, or where royal fortunes have been placed suddenly in the possession of the elected of the people. What ought the people to do with them? Are they to be regarded in the light of private property, or do they "go with the job," so to speak?

The present German government is a little perplexed by this problem. The delightful Hohenzollerns have lodged a claim for about 1,000,000,000 marks, and the obsequious National Convention would have instantly passed that claim but for the resistance of the Socialists, who believed that such an action would be a reflection on the great new German democracy, as indeed it would. None the less the Socialists were quite willing to compromise. They were willing to vote an income for the Hohenzollerns that would enable them to live with decency, and this, by the way, is a thing that very few Hohenzollerns have ever yet been able to do. Eventually the matter was postponed, presumably until such time as the world should be looking another way, or should have something else to think about, which might easily happen at any moment.

The Hohenzollern claim does not represent cash alone. A large part of it consists of castles and palaces, and of these there are no less than twenty eminently desirable residences, as the real estate men would say, scattered all over Germany and in an admirable state of repair. Then there are fifty smaller castles, shooting lodges, and country houses. One wonders how it feels to own seventy castles, and to have to consult a card index every time one wanted to go away for a week-end.

But there is a good deal of ready cash, unavoidably left behind through the exigencies of the emperor's departure. It was deposited in all sorts of places, but the sum of 150,000,000 marks has been traced, and the jurists are now trying to determine to whom it belongs. If we were the German government we would first spend the money and then the jurists would be able to approach their task with that deliberative leisure so essential to justice. None of the Hohenzollern family has any private fortune. They have lived on their pay from a grateful people and they will be in dire straits if their castles and their cash should now be sequestered. The suicide of Prince Joachim is supposed to have been due to financial worries.

The Kaiser's brother-in-law, Prince Frederick Leopold, is almost the only Hohenzollern who was in any way rich in his own right. He is supposed to have a fortune of about 70,000,000 marks, which ought to be enough to keep the wolf from the door. But Prince Leopold is insanely extravagant, and some years ago his fortune was placed under a guardianship, luckily for him. His chief eccentricity was an inordinate love for trousers. It seems rather a curious article on which to lavish the tenderness of a loving heart. Not but what trousers are important. No wise man will neglect them, nor ever appear in public without them. It invariably leads to comment. But trousers should be kept in their place. They should not be allowed to monopolize the affections.

Prince Leopold used to order his trousers literally by the hundred. No one ever found out quite what he did with them. His chief trouble was with the creases. They refused to "stay put," and it may be said that better men than he have found the same difficulty and have had to live it down. But it occurred to the mighty mind of Prince Leopold that if he could only refrain from bending his knees his trousers would not only remain creased, but he could also save them from that sartorial deformation known as hagginess. Now walking is not necessarily fatal to the "set" of the trousers, but no man who really respects his trousers will ever sit down. The process of hitching up the trousers when one takes a seat—it must be done sometimes—is a palliative, but only a palliative. It is not a remedy. So Prince Leopold ordered two dozen automobiles, so constructed as to permit him to stretch his legs without bending his knees. It was not wholly satisfactory, but then what is? At best it is an imperfect world, and not even our finest art can wholly compensate for the heedless deficiencies of nature. Prince Leopold must sometimes have wished that he were a Highlander instead of a Prussian. Then he could have dispensed with trousers altogether, and their innate cussedness would have troubled him no more.

The German government has therefore a hard problem to solve, but it is safe to predict that it will not allow the Hohenzollerns to lack bread, nor even a little butter to spread upon it. Already several million marks' worth of furniture and fittings have been sent from the German royal palaces to Doorn in Holland. It is not likely that we shall have to arrange for a "pencil day" or a "button day" to relieve the needs of the Hohenzollerns.

It is almost a relief to turn from the Hohenzollerns to the Bonapartes. There were had sheep in plenty among the Bonapartes, but there were none that made us physically sick. At least they spared us their pieties. Louis Napoleon was rather a contemptible figure, but not actually a hateful one, and the Empress Eugénie, while she had many fundamental concepts that were loathsome to us, was never known to do anything mean.

There was no reason why Eugénie should have had imperial ideas. She was not born with them. Indeed she was poor and obscure. The Countess Montijo, after the death of her husband, took both her daughters abroad and every one knew that the object of the journey was to find husbands for them. In London they met the Countess Walewska, whose brother asked permission to present his friend, Prince Louis Napoleon Bonaparte, who was then an exile and living a penurious life in Leicester Square. The prince fell in love with Eugénie and the Duke of Alba fell in love with her sister. The young women had not done so badly after all.

The crowned heads of Europe did not like Eugénie. She was not royal. For a long time there was no recognition for Eugénie. If royal blood was to be tainted in this way, who could tell what the result might be? But the boycott came to an end. Boycotts always do. We knew a man once who married a Democrat, but he lived it down. When Eugénie was married a scribe of that day, who doubtless had his own enmities to gratify, wrote that the French people "hailed with universal acclamation the auspicious wedding of the daughter of Herodias with Judas Iscariot."

What memories Eugénie must have had. There must have been perpetual visions before her fading sight, and sometimes there must have been curious blendings of blood and triumph. At the opening of the Suez Canal she wore a dress that cost $25,000, and it was subsequently given in payment of a debt when the dark days came and she had to fly from Paris. It is said that this same dress was afterwards brought to America and it may still be in existence somewhere.

Eugénie was curiously insensitive to justice so far as the people were concerned. She could hardly conceive that there were any rights other than those of her class. When she was expelled from the Tuilleries she compared her sufferings with those of the butterfly tortured by cruel boys. But in her case it was the cruel butterfly that had been torturing the boys. When Victor Hugo wrote his terrible "Napoleon the Little," after the massacre which had given her husband his throne, she said: "What offense can we have given to this M. Hugo that he should speak of us like this?"

Some one, writing of Eugénie's early days at court said:

"No one knew better than the Empress Eugénie that the throne to which she had been so magically raised rested upon a shaky base. She thought of the future and saw that her court was not what she would have wished it to be. All France's most illustrious citizens were in exile or living in hostile retirement."

"The grand seigneurs of the old nobility—such men as the Dukes of Noailles, La Rochefoucauld, and Luynes—although every means was tried to win them over, refused with something more than contempt to appear at the Tuilleries, while from foreign courts came the echoes of biting epigrams uttered by the leading potentates of Europe at the expense of the new régime."

"It was hoped that the political visit which Queen Victoria paid to Paris in 1852 would induce other crowned heads to follow suit, and the crowned heads came indeed, but they would not bring their wives with them. The court receptions continued to be gatherings of enriched adventurers, place hunters, traveling princes, and foreign tourists. To the very end the empress felt keenly the odor of disrepute which hung over such a court."

There have been many kindly summaries of the character of Eugénie. She had her virtues, and they were many. But will any one ever write a kindly summary of the character of the Kaiser?

ROMAN PROFITEERS.

"Who has so dull a breast or is so alien to the feeling of humanity that he can be ignorant, say rather that he has not seen with his own eyes, that in commodities which are bought and sold in markets or handled in the daily trade of cities extravagance in prices has gone so far that the unbridled lust of plunder could be moderated neither by abundant supplies nor fruitful seasons?"

Who indeed?

The question would have been a fitting introduction to the ruminations of any modern philosopher, but it was asked instead by Diocletian in the year 301 A. D.—all of which shows that there is nothing new under the sun, and that high prices, and possibly revolutions and prohibition and other matters, are only visiting the world again, and somewhere in the cycle the pleasanter things are returning also.

One can not feel feeling (says the New York Evening Post) that Diocletian had the right idea in dealing with the situation, for he said further: "And to the avarice of those who are always eager to turn to their own profit even the blessings of God, and to check the tide of general prosperity: . . . who, individually possessed of immense fortunes which might have enriched whole peoples to their heart's content, seek private gain and are bent upon ruinous percentages; to their avarice regard for humanity persuades us . . . to set a limit." Diocletian sets forth the defects of various practices, all too familiar to need repetition, and concludes his edict with a "list of commodities and services and the maximum prices beyond which it is unlawful to sell or serve." He added the significant statement that those who found fault with these restrictions were men "whose avarice could be appeased neither by the prosperity of the times nor by the riches for which they have manifestly striven—nor indeed by high prices," and directed that those who should "proceed holdly against the prescriptions of this decree" would become liable to capital punishment.

The "maximum prices" are interesting by way of comparison and makes us feel that life in the days of Diocletian was much less complex and difficult—even before he put the curb on profiteers. The prices fixed for meat and fish varied from 8 to 16 dinarii per pound, and as authorities place the dinarii at values from one-half to one cent, it seems that profiteering was held in check. A chicken could bring not more than 60 dinarii and an entire "turtle dove" could be bought for 12. Consider a land where the high price limit for eggs was either 6 or 12 cents a dozen, according to which "rate of exchange" one decides to accept. It is not surprising that these ancients were able to calculate in terms of a coin which could scarcely be seen at the present time. Using the higher rate of exchange, cheese came at 12 cents a pound, cauliflowers were five for 4 cents, and "second rate" ones might be had at ten for 4 cents. Onions were twenty-five for 3 cents or fifty second-rate ones at the same price. The second-rate variety seems to have applied to most foodstuffs, and this variety of vegetable came at 1 cent each. Second-rate apples sold at the rate of five for a cent—and it must be remembered that these were all the high price limits.

As for the laborer, his services came at rates varying from 2 to 70 cents per day, according to his trade. The only exception is in the case of the "figure painter," who, we take it, is otherwise known as an artist and who, strangely enough, received more than twice the remuneration common to the "wall painter." "Second-rate" laborers are not mentioned and were doubtless subject to the same wage scale.

The edict of Diocletian limited the price on certain types of shoes to 30 dinarii a pair, and shoes ranged from this variety to the very finest "shoes for patricians," for which 150 dinarii might be asked. Other articles of apparel were valued on a similar scale, as, for instance, "a woman's plain, common tunic" for 16 dinarii and a "cloak" at the same price. Wines could be sold as high as 30 dinarii per pint and a half in some instances, while the more ordinary varieties could not be held above 8 and 16 dinarii. Beer was sold at from 2 to 4 dinarii, according to quality. But it all happened seventeen hundred years ago. If these were the days of wickedness and avarice described by Diocletian, the tranquil times of that same ancient epoch must have been worth living for.

The Laodiceans.

"To the Angel of the Church of the Laodiceans write . . . I know thy works, that thou art neither hot nor cold. I would thou wert cold or hot."

We are the Laodiceans: we know not the ice nor the fire;

We have never sprung to the edge of doom at the call of a brave desire;

We have basked in the tepid noon-tides; we have drawn an even breath;

We have never felt between our lips the savors of life or death.

We are the Laodiceans, loved not by God nor man; We boast in our ease or riches, and take what praise we can;

No love shall sear us with longing, no grief shall turn us to stone;

We shall not dance to the pipes of Spring, nor answer to joy or moan.

We are the Laodiceans: when God's great summons came, Cleaving the hosts of living men, as with a line of flame,

We were tossed aside like vagrant leaves at an idle wind's behest,

For we knew not the ways of battle, and we found not the ways of rest.

We are the Laodiceans: we have slight fear of Hell,

For even its master can not say, "Ye have done my bidding well."

And what for us would Heaven be, with its endless lift and range?

We are doomed to a passionless limbo, that knows not life nor change.

We are the Laodiceans: we care not for wrong nor right;

We have no part in a world's defense, no cause for which to fight;

The fruits of the ground are sweet; we would rest in our garden-places,

But God Himself shall drive us out, between the black star-spaces.

We are the Laodiceans: our fight is with only those Who would send us to burning deserts, or whelm us in alien snows;

We feel no lure of march nor flight; we taste not hope nor shame;

And we die, in our visionless Eden, of a curse without a name.

The Campaign.

It is gratifying to note that the presidential campaign begins in a manner not inconsistent—as has many another campaign—with the dignity of the great posts to be filled. The nominees of both parties are men of respectable character and of respectable powers. Personally Messrs. Harding, Cox, Coolidge, and Roosevelt are men above reproach. There is nothing of the mysterious, there is nothing of the self-centered egotist in any one of them; and in the White House any one of the four would stand a figure concerning whom the country need have no serious fears, of whom it need not be ashamed. It is evident that we are to have a campaign on high ground, and in this there is profound cause for public satisfaction. Its tendency will be to lift our national politics to a level higher than in recent times, marked as they have been more or less by personal ill-will and by vulgarities of competition in denunciation. The personal element has been too much emphasized in recent campaigns. It is high time for return to the sound conception of the presidency as a representative office to be filled upon considerations more vital to the country, more weighty in all ways, than upon considerations founded in personality. This is not to say that personality is a quality to be disregarded in connection with the presidential office. In the nature of things it is a matter of profound importance, but all the proprieties require that it should be held subordinate to the larger motives of public interest. Fortunately in the present campaign, all candidates being of high character, public attention may be concentrated upon issues that are really vital.

The Republican Party in the Senate.

The country has had sufficient reminder during the past two years of the hindrances to effective working of the governmental machine when the President represents one set of political motives and Congress another. We have seen these two branches of the government at locked horns at a time when great issues have been pending, and out of the conflict there have come a thousand embarrassments. If something has been to the good in the sense of checking the autocratic disposition of a President both embittered in spirit and distempered in mind, still the account has run heavily to the debit side. It is vastly desirable that President and Congress should aim at common purposes and work with the harmony that only common purpose may inspire.

Universal expectation—even among Democrats of candid mind—looks to the election of Mr. Harding. And it is not too much to say, assuming Mr. Harding's success, that the maintenance of a Republican majority in the Senate is scarcely less important. With Mr. Harding in the White House and with a Democratic Congress at the other end of Pennsylvania Avenue there would be a situation not dissimilar to that which has ruled at Washington these two years past. Much of what the country expects in the way of relief from existing mischiefs will be unattainable unless there shall be coordination between the executive and the legislative branches of the government. When there are essential differences in principles and motives between coordinate authorities, aggravated by the prejudices and passions inevitable in connection with radical differences, paralysis, or something approximate to it, is bound to occur.

These reflections are pertinent to the situation as it stands today respecting the Senate. Of the ninety-six members of the Senate forty-seven are Democrats. With Mr. La Follette—always an uncertain quantity—acting with the Republicans, as he has done for the most part in recent months, there has been a Republican majority of one vote. La Follette has now definitely abandoned the party and in future may not be counted upon where Republican interests and purposes are concerned. Thus today in its political complexion the Senate stands forty-eight Republicans, forty-seven Democrats, with one member in the rôle of the piggy so busy running about as to defy enumeration. Of the Republicans, Gronna of North Dakota has failed of renomination, and the man named in his stead, subject to election in November, is of the La Follette type, a personal and political eccentric quite as likely to run with the hare as to chase with the hounds. Newberry of Michigan, a Republican, is under indictment for corrupt practice in the campaign leading to his election and is bound to be eliminated, with no certainty as to the political character of his successor. Spencer of Missouri, another Republican, chosen by a narrow majority two years ago in a state normally Democratic, may be reelected, but his success may not be counted upon definitely. Then there is Norris of Nebraska, Borah of Idaho, and Johnson of California, nominally Republicans, but so unstable in political character as not to be dependable in relation to party principles or interests.

In respect of these facts Republican control of the Senate is uncertain. It can only be maintained—even then upon a narrow margin—if the party can hold what it has got and make gains somewhere down the line. As to the latter possibility there is reason for hope in Delaware, Maryland, Kentucky, South Dakota, and California. But there is no assurance in any one of these instances, and it behooves those who have the matter in hand—it behooves all Republicans in truth—to be earnest and active in the party cause.

In California Mr. Phelan, who is standing for reelection, holds a fairly strong position in spite of the fact that his party is in the minority. To the prestige of incumbency there is added in his behalf the advantages which attach to large personal fortunes, to resourceful family connections, affiliation with various politico-social organizations, etc. His reelection is a possibility to be reckoned with. In opposition to Mr. Phelan there will be in November either Mr. Wallace of Los Angeles, Mr. Kent of Marin County, or Mr. Shortridge of San Francisco. Neither Wallace nor Kent is a dependable Republican. Each in his way is a political eccentric whose candidacy as a Republican is in its essence fraudulent. In the announcement of his candidacy Mr. Kent did not even declare himself in terms a Republican. The primary election that will determine which of these three—Wallace, Kent, or Shortridge—shall stand as the Republican candidate in November is near at hand. The Republicans of California owe it to themselves and to the party, likewise to the prospective authority of Republicanism in the government, to support the one candidate who is assuredly and devotedly a Republican, unquestionably dependable in his affiliation and loyalty. Quite independent of personal or other considerations, the obligation of every intelligent and consistent Republican is to give his vote in the coming primary to Mr. Shortridge.

Mr. Harding's Speech of Acceptance.

As a practical journalist Mr. Harding should have known better than to string out his address of acceptance to a length beyond the powers of endurance and mental digestion of the average citizen. By making his speech too long he has placed it in its entirety beyond the range of all but a very narrow margin of the electorate. Thus the newspaper headline maker, not always or often a discreet or a friendly interpreter, becomes the medium through which Mr. Harding's views are put before the country. Mr. Harding has employed the scatter-gun where he might better have resorted to the rifle.

But for all its too much explanatory verbiage the utterance is a sound one. It is more direct under close analysis than in appearance. It leaves no doubt in the mind of anybody who will read it carefully that Mr. Harding is a man of definite and practical judgments in strict accord with the Constitution, with the national traditions, with the temperament of the plain people of the country. There is in it emphatic repudiation of that vague mass of loose generalization, of impracticable theory, and of false assumption constituting what may be called Wilsonianism.

Mr. Harding leaves no reader in doubt that in the presidential office he will (1) bring the government in its working activities back to the constitutional basis; that (2) he will bring into the executive group—the cabinet—the best available talent and the broadest experience the country affords; that (3) he will repudiate in practice the one-man principle which has ruled these seven years past; that (4) he will cooperate, as the Constitution directs, with the other departments of the government; that (5) he will hold the government to a generous conception of its world obligations; that (6) he will respect and strictly enforce the laws designed to protect the country against class contentions; that (7) he will substitute business methods for the extravagance which now puts an unreasonable burden of taxation upon industry and enterprise; that (8) he will give to the country an interested, intelligent, and diligent administration of affairs so far as they stand related to the executive office.

We could wish that in defining his attitude to the league of nations as proposed by President Wilson Mr. Harding had given in positive terms what he stands for rather than that to which he stands opposed. True it comes to the same thing under scrutiny, but there is a "punch" in the positive form of statement which is not achieved by the negative method. Yet here perhaps we are over-critical in view of the fact that Mr. Harding makes it plain that while he is for a league of nations he does not accept the Wilson project with its subordination of American policy to foreign authority and its pledge of American men and money to support the "territorial integrity" of the various members of the league. Later on there will be abundant opportunity for Mr. Harding to deal with this great issue, and what he has said is a sufficient guarantee that he will do it in terms nobody may fail to understand.

No intelligent man may read Mr. Harding's speech in its full text, or even in summary, without being impressed by the fact that it will be impracticable to hinge the coming campaign upon any single issue. The range of national interests, the range of national obligations, the need of varied reforms in governmental practice, these are no less important than the issue which Mr. Wilson is seeking to place above all other considerations. Not the league project alone, but the entire scheme of administrative policy that may be styled Wilsonianism make in their aggregate the supreme issue, and upon this issue Mr. Harding exhibits himself in his address of acceptance, in too many words to be sure, but none the less in clear and definite light.

With reference to the address of acceptance let us say again, as we said before its appearance, that Mr. Harding is as far as possible from pretension as a superman. On the other hand he is a man of plain type, of practical capacity, trained in studies and labors related to governmental affairs. In the presidency he may be depended upon to plow a straight course with intelligence, with honesty, with diligence, with fidelity. Unless we mistake the state of the public mind, this is what the country wants. We have had more than enough of "divinely ordained" egotism.

As to "Honest Methods" in Mexico.

There is humor—and it can hardly be unconscious—in Governor Cantu's grave demand to the de facto government of Mexico that it proceed in the "presidential" election by "honest methods." Honest methods—otherwise legal proceedings—in Mexico! Verily, it is to laugh. At last accounts there were in Mexico approximately eighteen millions of people. Of this total approximately five millions are Indians—practically savages, unacquainted with any language save tribal gibberish. Under the law they are entitled to vote, but they are practically as little qualified to do it intelligently or even automatically as so many cattle on the Mexican hillsides. Then the peon element in Mexico runs to something like twelve millions of political incapables. They are illiterate, practically without fixed property, absolutely negligible in a political sense. Under direction they are not without certain capabilities, but political knowledge or any other sort of knowledge qualifying them for judgment in affairs of state is wholly alien to them. The literate element of Mexico runs in numbers not much over one million, approximately between 4 and 5 per cent. of the total. Only this small fraction of the Mexican people is politically competent, and even of this fraction not more than one in fifty takes an intelligent interest in the political affairs of the country.

The truth of the situation is that Mexico, while still an uncivilized country, has a paper constitution practically adaptable only to a country where education and intelligence are universal. It is an artificial system borrowed from the United States, in no sense a product of the life of Mexico and not susceptible of being applied to it by any means consonant with "honest methods." "Honest" or legal methods of election are not practicable or possible; and nobody should know this better than Governor Cantu. For long to come Mexico must be governed, if governed at all, arbitrarily. The practical choice is between a welter of savage anarchy and government by authority. Neither, it is needless to say is ideal, but the facts of the case present, not a theory, but a condition.

The late President Diaz, who did much to organize Mexico industrially and who succeeded for thirty years or more in maintaining order in the country, was in reality a dictator. He gave to Mexico the only kind of government practicable, but his methods were far from being honest in the sense implied in Governor Cantu's appeal. There can be no application of "honest methods"—otherwise legal methods—in Mexico under a representative system inapplicable to the actual and practical conditions of the country.

Mr. Daniels as a Host.

The late Charles A. Dana, a man of many accomplishments upon a foundation of solid wisdom, once remarked that the most difficult of all arts is that of graceful play. Any man, he said, may learn to dig, a few may learn to talk and write, only the very elect ever achieve "holiday arts." It would have been well for Secretary Daniels if he might have imbibed something of the great editor's philosophy, and if before giving himself up to holiday play he had learned the general rules of courtesy as they have respect and authority among gentlemen. Yet it may be doubted if a man of such indurated stolidity of mind could ever be other than awkward in attempting a thing foreign to his propensity and experience. One by nature a chump and by habit a chump usually makes, when he attempts gracious practice, very much the failure of the traditional monkey when he painted his tail a delicate sky blue.

Now for several weeks Mr. Daniels has been amusing himself by a spectacular parade in Pacific waters and ports attended by a fleet of naval vessels, a magnificent entourage of naval forces, at a cost to the taxpayers of the country by moderate estimate of something over a hundred thousand dollars per day. Incidentally Mr. Daniels has been amusing that part of the public which lacks the gravity of mind to note the folly—we came nearly saying criminality—of the whole wasteful and ridiculous procedure.

After employing some half-dozen or more ships of the United States Navy for the glory and edification of the National Democratic Convention at San Francisco, Mr. Daniels sailed in the battleship New Mexico for Seattle. He took with him as guests—and here it may be remarked that it is mighty handy to be able to pay one's personal and political debts at government expense—Senators Pittman of Nevada and Walsh of Montana. Pittman has been conducting the defense of Mr. Daniels before the Senate Committee on Naval Affairs, which investigated the charges made by Admiral Sims. Walsh, like Pittman, is an Administration wheelhorse and is unfailingly useful when a combination of subservency and serviceability is required. Daniels and his ship were due to arrive at Seattle coincidentally with the arrival of Secretary Payne of the Interior Department. The Seattle people had arranged a luncheon in honor of the two Secretaries. Pittman and Walsh were at the time members of the Daniels party and had accepted invitations to go to Alaska. The New Mexico was late in arriving, which queered things a bit by postponing the luncheon until late in the afternoon. But when she did heave to a local reception committee clambered aboard to tender an official welcome, taking with them that inevitable nuisance a photographer to make record of the glorifical and historic scene.

After the manner of the host so interested in himself that he forgets the obligations of courtesy to his guests, Mr. Daniels neglected to inform the Seattle folk that he had with him two distinguished senators. Likewise the newspaper reporters failed to discover that Pittman and Walsh were of the official party. Hence, when the photographer set up his instrument to make his picture, the Seattleites quite brusquely asked Pittman and Walsh to step aside, since it was desired only to include notables in the ensemble. A little later the two senators, slightly dazed but still hopeful, came ashore with the great man for the belated luncheon. Here again Mr. Daniels was so busy that he failed to take stock of his guests; and the Seattle people failed to realize that Pittman and Walsh were other than intruders. It is sad to relate the fact that the two senators found themselves rank outsiders: no seats had been assigned to them and no attention of any kind was paid them. Now senators of the United States take themselves quite seriously, and with ruffled dignity Pittman and Walsh retrieved their hats and proceeded to a downtown joint, where they refreshed themselves as well as they could in a town where prohibition is strictly enforced—in public places.

Not until the next day did the members of the Seattle reception committee take in the fact that two senators of the United States—men likely to be in office long after the great Josephus shall have returned to that dear Charlotte and to his normal obscurity—had been both slighted and snubbed. They succeeded to the extent of convincing the aggrieved gentlemen that the fault lay with Mr. Daniels in his failure to inform the committee that there were guests with him, and who they were. The fact was in its way consoling, but it did not achieve the effect of satisfying Walsh and Pittman that their host had treated them with proper consideration. Without more ado they decided to cut the Alaska trip; and suiting the action to the thought, they took their luggage from the ship, leaving word for the Secretary that they would go no further. Pittman promptly left for Nevada and Walsh for Montana.

There may be something in the sequel, for Senator Pittman, so it is understood, has been commissioned to write the minority report of the Sims investigation. It may be that Mr. Daniels will not get that coat of whitewash he has been expecting.

Oil Supply for the Navy.

The wholesale price of fuel oil at points on San Francisco Bay is now and for some time has been $2.03 per barrel. This price is paid by general consumers, including the United States Army, the railroads, and other large users of oil. To greater or less extent the several marketing companies pump the product from their own wells, but they are all heavy buyers from small producers, the rates to such producers at the wells being $1.60 per barrel. The difference between $1.60 and $2.03 per barrel represents the cost of transporting oil from the interior to the seaboard, with the profit of the marketing company. Broadly speaking, there is no complaint against the marketing companies of extortion. It is universally conceded that the margin between the price at the well and the price to consumers—namely, 43 cents per barrel—is not unreasonable. As has already been stated, the current price is paid without protest by consumers who take more than 95 per cent. of the total product.

The Navy Department alone demands oil at a price below the current market rate. Assuming the margin of 43 cents for transportation from the wells to the seaboard and for the profit of the marketing companies to be unreasonable, it proposes a price of $1.72 per barrel and it demands that its needs be supplied at this rate. By threat of force it has succeeded in supplying its needs over the protests of the supplying companies.

The authority under which the Navy seizes oil at its own price is that of legislation enacted for the emergencies of war, and which continues in technical force because, due to President Wilson's insistence, we are still technically at war. The need of the Navy is not that of war-time, but of a time of practical peace, and it includes only such "emergencies" as Secretary Daniels' junketing voyages up and down the coast between Panama and Alaska. Neither in law nor in morals have the naval authorities the right to employ war powers for purchases and uses having no relation to a condition of war. In every sense except technically the war legislation under which seizures of oil are concurrently made is obsolete. Under the logic and the authority by which the Navy is now seizing oil in San Francisco Bay it might as well secure its supplies of flour, potatoes, and what not by the same method. Its procedure in the matter of oil is arbitrary and outrageous and in contempt of the Constitution of the United States, which provides that private property may not be taken for public use without just compensation.

It hardly needs be said that the Argonaut holds no brief for the oil companies. It is not in their interest that it speaks in condemnation of the course of the Navy Department, but in respect of the integrity of the Constitution and common standards of business fair dealing.

Governor Coolidge Speaks.

In Governor Coolidge's brief formal acceptance of the vice-presidential nomination we have a view of what is obviously a fine generalizing mind. Rarely has anybody—much less a candidate—in dealing with affairs of government put so much in such condensed form. Very obviously the convention that named Governor Coolidge for the vice-presidency made no mistake. It is further gratifying to bear in mind Mr. Harding's pledge that in the event of his election the Vice-President will be invited to participate in meetings of the cabinet. A man of Mr. Coolidge's record and of his now demonstrated capacity for detached thought and for straightforward courage can not fail to be a force for good in the counsels of the Executive.

Editorial Notes.

There is that in the practical working of prohibition that curiously illustrates the innate infirmity of human calculations. There is in the country a large store of "hard liquors." Furthermore our national "hard" drink—whisky—is easily supplied through domestic manufacture or evasion of law. It comes high, to be sure, but there is whisky in plenty for those willing to pay the price, and at the price buyers are plenty. On the other hand there are relatively light stores of wines and beer. The practical effect is that many—many thousands in truth—who in pre-prohibition days were consumers of table wines and beer have turned to the more easily obtainable "hard liquors." Thus very many who in other days were careful to avoid whisky have now become more or less regular whisky drinkers, as well as lawbreakers, with effects very much to the bad as related to physical and moral health.

Most Americans, we think, would have been quite willing to have seen Sir Thomas Lipton "lift" the America cup. In his four attempts to do so, running over a period of twenty-one years, he has shown pluck, persistence, and courtesy. As a game loser he has won the admiration and good-will of everybody. He now proposes, in case there shall be no other challenger, to try again in 1922. The Argonaut cordially wishes him luck.

One Terrace of Orillia, Washington, urges importation into the country of a million Japanese laborers to be employed in clearing for agricultural uses large areas of logged-off timber land in the Northwest—the laborers to be returned to their homes when the special job shall be done. This proposal is not likely to find acceptance, yet there is something to be said for it. For this particular work there is no available supply of domestic labor; and even if domestic labor were to be had, it could not profitably be employed at ruling rates of wages. Only by cheap labor is it practicable to clear and make ready for the plow the logged-off lands of the Northwest. On the other hand it remains to be considered that a million or any considerable number of Orientals brought into the country nominally for a special task could hardly be held to that task as against other demands. It is true that the clearing of these lands by cheap labor would be an immediate economic advantage. But economic considerations make only part of the issue. The country would better go slow by wholesome methods than to go faster by means tending to general social disadvantage. It will not be a bad thing for the American people to learn respect for labor in its simpler and humbler forms; and this will not be if whenever there is a difficult work to be done we shall import alien and more or less degraded hands to do it. In good time—when there is vital need for the and—the logged-off areas of Washington and Oregon will be cleared. We would better go slow and do the work ourselves than to go fast subject to demoralizations which would surely follow the importation of a servile class with the consequent development among our own people of a contemptuous attitude toward plain hard work.

If President Wilson is to continue "worrying" until his "great vision" of the United States as a subordinate unit in a super-government of the world shall be achieved, he is surely booked for a long and anxious future. Our people have no wish to shirk their world responsibilities, but never will they consent to surrendering any part or function of national sovereignty to an alien council; and never will they consent that their sons may be drafted and sent to lay down their lives in alien wars. Mr. Wilson will do well to put that "great vision" behind him and settle down to such content as he may be able to find in the things that belong to his individual responsibility. His Utopian fancies will not disturb the serenity of the American people, still less spire them to whimsical courses.

Three-fifths of the original timber of the United States has been used and this country is now using timber four times as rapidly as it is being grown. There are only two billion two hundred million feet of timber left standing in the entire country.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR.

The Third Party.

LOS ANGELES, July 15, 1920.

TO THE EDITOR—Sir: As a native-born and loyal citizen of the United States I ask to express the following views as to the third party and its platform: In the first place, I welcome it; and in the second, I consider it a blessing to our country. And as to the first, I explain that the platform is a conglomeration of the ideas of principles of the various ultra-radical elements who do not believe in a rational, normal form of government, the "ists," and the "ites." As to the second opinion, the publicity given to the ideas and principles will serve to bring into the limelight the diverse sections of our voters who are inimical to democracy, are vulgar disturbers, and who, unless kept in leash by law, would wreck our government, destroy our national existence, and ruin our social organization.

It now behooves the protective association of our land to be alert; the Federal, state, and municipal police to watch and listen, and when proof of disloyalty and moral treason is shown to act to the end that the world shall realize that this is a land of freedom, ruled by the laws of God and man; that the principles adopted by us in our Declaration of Independence are just and promote the welfare of humanity, and that having been tried and successfully survived for over a century are destined to live many more.

This third party embodies (appropriating another word from our neighbors on the south) the Villalistas of the present political campaign. Draw its fangs or crush the venomous snake! Respectfully yours, MAURICE GRADWOHL.

A Somewhat Strained Analogy.

STOCKTON, CAL., July 27, 1920.

TO THE EDITOR—Sir: Ancient your article on Japan in the current issue, the following extract from the London Sunday Pictorial may be interesting:

The revival of the anti-Japanese agitation in California is fraught with possibilities to which American soldiers have before now drawn attention. When the agitation first became acute General Homer Lee pointed out that a Japanese expedition could seize California before the United States could assemble a force fit to face them, and that, as the frontiers of California are waterless deserts, it might very well take the Americans a quarter of a century to turn them out again.

If you substitute England and Germany for Japan and America, your editorial reads very much like so many of the editorials in the English papers before the war, when Lord Roberts and others warned the people of the German peril. There appeared no reason then for Germany wanting to attack any one, as they were absorbing the trade of the world by peaceful methods.

When overseas I met a man who had resided in the Orient for thirteen years, and he referred to the Japanese as "the Prussians of the East."

F. GRAHAM TOLLIT.

THE VOICE OF THE PRESS.

Only a Johnson "Truce."

(From the New York Times.)

Senator Hiram Johnson's letter to a Boston sympathizer is of a sort to make the Old Guard's flesh creep. Republicans will rightly fear that the California senator seems to "support" Harding in 1920 very much as he supported Hughes in 1916. Just for the moment Senator Johnson is waiting for Harding's speech of acceptance. If, as he confidently expects, the Republican candidate reviles and repudiates that work of Satan, the league of nations, then Johnson will feel that he has won a victory on "the big issue," and will "cheerfully go forward with the Republican party."

That promise, however, is good for this campaign only, and perhaps not all of that. Senator Johnson serves distinct notice that he is merely "declaring a truce." As soon as possible he intends to open war upon "the system which he saw in its ugly nakedness exemplified at Chicago." He will not forget the men who forced upon the Republican convention their own "cynical and contemptuous disregard of the expressed will of the people." The California senator is determined to "hold up to public obloquy" these men. Who are they? Why, of course, the men who brought about the nomination of Harding. The Ohio senator might well send a tearful telegram to the California senator: "Call you this supporting the ticket?"

Harmony First.

(From the New York Evening Post.)

The country breathes freely again. Governor Cox has seen President Wilson; they have had a talk face to face, and although Admiral Grayson was present by way of precaution, it did not become necessary for him to intervene. The President, the governor, and Assistant Secretary Roosevelt, in his rôle of nominee for Vice-President, officially announce that their hearts beat as one. Democrats are elated, and Republicans hope that it will wear off. There is one Republican, indeed, who went to the trouble of discounting the little drama. This was no less an authority upon harmony than Senator Harding. "The President and the Democratic nominee for his successor are in conference today," he remarked, "and at the conclusion it will inevitably be announced that they found themselves in complete accord, that harmony reigns and unity is established in the Democratic party." Surely this is a cold-blooded view to take of heaven's first law. We can not imagine Senator Harding's campaign manager, Chairman Hays, speaking so lightly of party harmony. From him we have gained the idea that it was just about a party's most precious possession.

Content and Unashamed.

(From the New York Times.)

The New Republic, surveying the political landscape from its watch-tower of whimsical discontent, reports that the United States is in no mood for radical experimentation. Everywhere it discerns a wicked disposition to go to work to build on the old foundations. It sees no chance this year except of a result in the elections that it will be compelled to interpret as "reactionary." This is a conveniently ambiguous swear-word, but what it means in the present instance is not in doubt. It means that the people as a whole are turning a deaf ear to the advocates of upheaval, charm they never so wisely. The incantations of the direct actionists and the indirect seditionists are now more laughed at than feared. When Mr. Amos Pinchot comes back from Chicago to say that the trouble with the Third party promoters was that they numbered too many "mushheads," there is no doubt what the popular verdict will be.

It is most ungrateful and rebellious of the country, after all the lurid preaching inflicted upon it about the coming day of wrath, when the elements of the old parties were to melt with fervent heat, to be settling down comfortably to an unexciting campaign, but this is what it is—sensibly doing. It refuses to be alarmed. It thinks more of getting back to normal than of longer listening to the abnormalities and the fantasies. It is an awful confession to make, one that will cause the eager neophytes of anarchy to think up several new definitions with which to hide their real intentions, but Americans are today showing every sign of being reasonably well satisfied with their political institutions, and of hoping for fairly good results from them. It is bad enough to have such a base contentment. But it is worse not even to be ashamed of it.

Another Witness Speaks.

(From the New York Tribune.)

The crushing testimony of Mrs. Philip Snowden, wife of the British labor leader, himself an ardent Socialist, on Bolshevik rule in Russia is now supplemented by the utterances of Mr. Henry Vincent Keeling, lately Russian correspondent of the Westminster Gazette, who has just returned to England after being imprisoned at Moscow for ten months. Mrs. Snowden, it will be recalled, said Bolshevism was not Socialism, not even Communism or the dictatorship of the proletariat, but "the dictatorship of six men, aided by an extraordinary commission." She rejects Soviet rule because it is tyrannical, also because it is inefficient.

Her central statement—that Bolshevism can teach the British workingman nothing—is now repeated verbatim by Mr. Keeling, who is not a Socialist, but a Liberal. He denounces Bolshevik militarism. "Everybody is either in the army, his most telling point about that growth of a new bureaucracy which strikes all first-hand observers of Russian conditions as the central fact of Soviet rule.

Conditions in Russia are very bad, Mr. Keeling says. But Lenin and his associates have their power well in hand and are well established. "They are likely to be in power for a long while. A new and more virulent bureaucracy is growing up in Russia. All the intelligentsia are accepting posts under the government. There is nothing else for them to do."

Her Infinite Variety.

(Alice La Mazière in Figaro.)

Those who had the rare pleasure of looking in on a plenary session of the International Woman's Conference at Geneva were, in a few instances, unconvinced that out of such a variegated group unity of action and opinion could be possible. There were delegates from all parts of the world—blonde and heavy Scandinavians, robust and energetic Americans, frail and brunette Spaniards, Italians, and Greeks, expressionless and saffron-colored Japanese and Hindus in over-embroidered gowns. And there were Frenchwomen despite the fact that, though France has marched at the head of so many movements of emancipation, it will be a long while before she enfranchises her daughters. And we must not forget the delegate from Iceland, who journeyed for thirty days to be with us and came dressed in festival costume. But Lady Astor, our good colleague from England, was the charm and grace of the conference. What will come of it all? Notwithstanding the opposition that women are meeting in certain countries—Spain, Italy, Switzerland, Turkey, France—the day is not far distant when we will act as a body in moral, political, educational, and domestic questions. And our voice will be heard when the spectre of war threatens to arise.

A Hohenzollern Suicide.

(From the New York World.)

Whatever his private reasons for self-slaughter, Prince Joachim's sad end can not be dissociated from political causes. The suicide rate, always high in Germany, is especially swollen now by war defeat and domestic turbulence. But how mighty is the change the war has wrought! Of how little consequence now is the suicide of even a Hohenzollern!

Cox and the League.

(From Washington Correspondence of New York Sun and Herald.)

Efforts are being made by leading Democrats to discover a way by which Governor Cox may get out from under the burden of the Wilson-Cox compact on the league of nations entered into here last Sunday.

The famous White House conference resulting in the dual statements by the President and Governor Cox to the effect that they were one on the league and that what President Wilson had promised Governor Cox would endeavor to fulfill has raised a storm of protest.

Democrats returning from the conference at Columbus at which former Representative White, an alleged "dry," was elected as chairman of the campaign committee in place of E. H. Moore, a "wet," say the reaction against the results of the White House conference has not been favorable.

There has been a storm of protest by those Democrats who believed a new deal had been made in the Democratic party, that a new leader had been found, and that the burden supposed to cluster around the continued leadership of the President had been lifted.

The shock resulting from the reports of the conference which showed that Cox had swallowed the league, hook, bait, sinker, and all, was accordingly severe.

Leaving Sugar-Saving to the Others.

(From the New York World.)

That the threatened sugar famine was averted was not due, it develops, to the thrift and self-denial of consumers. The high prices attracted shipments from the small sugar-producing countries in lots of from 5000 to 50,000 tons which in the aggregate were sufficient to relieve the shortage. But as for any conservation of sugar by either manufacturers or housewives, "each housewife would leave it to the other to do whatever conserving there was to be done," and trade and household consumers alike bought in the same quantities as before and "regardless of the price they had to pay."

So much for the patriotic appeals to the public to reduce wasteful and self-indulgent consumption so that there might be sugar enough for all at a fair price.

The Bungled Peace.

(From the New York Tribune.)

If Governor Cox has committed himself to all that Mr. Wilson did abroad, as well as all that he promised to do, it will be up to him to accept responsibility for the President's bungling of the peace treaty. The secrets of the bungling process are being gradually disclosed. Senator Harding quoted on Monday a very pertinent statement by Colonel House, now European correspondent of the Philadelphia Public Ledger, to the effect that a preliminary treaty concerning army, navy, reparations, and delimitation of boundaries "could have been made by Christmas of 1918, and would have been not only the usual but the obvious thing to do."

At Paris Mr. Wilson, ignoring opinion in the United States, led the conference up a blind alley. The evil effects of the blunder confront the world on every hand. Does Governor Cox intend to accept full responsibility for the President's hurling and to stick to a policy which the world deplors and which has been repudiated even by those for whom Mr. Wilson overconfidently assumed to speak?

Sound Sense in Germany.

(From the New York Times.)

Dr. Walter Simons, the German foreign minister, asserts that Germany is going to keep her word this time—the word given at Spa; and he admits that previous German governments had not been "sufficiently punctilious" about carrying out the treaty. This is welcome frankness. No less frank is Dr. Simons' statement of the reason for this somewhat belated repentance. "The Entente powers are really serious in their threats to occupy more German territory." Hopes long cherished of an Italian secession from the conference, or at least of an Italian attitude of cold neutrality, were shattered by Count Sforza's declaration that France would have the support of her allies.

Germany's resolve to do her best is and must be the foundation for any true reconstruction in Europe. The Continent can not be rebuilt until the Germans exert themselves to make good the havoc they wrought. France can recover without it, but her recovery will be long delayed. If Germany does begin to pay in coal and in money, there is no reason to suppose that the pressure on her will be unduly severe. No one will ask the impossible; there will be a future for Germany as well as for the rest of Europe if Germany wills it. But the desirable turn of affairs was made possible only by the threat of force. Mr. Fehrenbach and Dr. Simons impressed Mr. Lloyd George as "two perfectly honest, upright men." But the first sign of German willingness to pay up follows the first really convincing threat of military coercion.

Mexico.

(From the Weekly Review.)

The efforts now being made by responsible Americans along the Mexican border to promote good will between the neighboring peoples may have more substantial results than anything that comes out of Washington. There is suspicion to allay, deep-seated hostility to overcome. Some of the ill feeling has its origin in natural causes, but most of it has been incited by agitators in both countries. A considerable part of radical propaganda in the United States has for several years been devoted to the nefarious work of keeping the Mexicans in a state of perpetual alarm over the alleged purpose of powerful American groups to force intervention. No doubt there are some such groups, and no doubt the belief in intervention has at various times, for good reasons or had, been widely held. But the argument for intervention rises or falls with the degree of peace and justice that prevails in Mexico, and it has no force or meaning in the face of a responsible Mexican government. The radical propagandists have merely aggravated the situation by inciting the hostility of the Mexican people.

It is unlikely that one person in a thousand has ever heard the name of Haym Salomon, a figure of importance in revolutionary times, yet one who has been strangely neglected in our annals. Haym Salomon was a Polish Jew banker of New York and Philadelphia who financed and backed the new United States in their fight for self-government. His services have been ignored for nearly 150 years, his name, although appearing in encyclopedias and in President Madison's correspondence to Randolph and in congressional records, also being mentioned in a few histories, is practically unknown. Haym Salomon was born at Lissa, Poland, in 1740. He came to America in 1772 and was identified with the cause of American independence. In 1776 he was imprisoned by the British on a charge of espionage, and although a prisoner succeeded in stirring up sedition among Hessian officers. Two years later he escaped to Philadelphia, where he became an agent of Robert Morris and succeeded in obtaining large sums from Holland and France for the conduct of the American war. Salomon loaned Morris about $600,000 of his own money for the patriot cause, and at his death in 1785 $400,000 of this had not been returned. In addition he supplied funds to Jefferson, Madison, Randolph, and other patriot leaders. Haym Salomon died at the age of forty-five in Philadelphia, leaving a widow and two small children. All his papers and the documents showing the government's obligation were lost in the confusion following the occupation of Washington, D. C., by the British in 1814.

Vicente Blasco Ibañez is the first prominent European to proclaim New York the greatest city in the world. Let any American abroad inquire the name of the world's greatest city, and without a second's hesitation the answer will come back—"London." But the author of "The Four Horsemen of the Apocalypse," after an extended visit in the United States, refutes this trite tradition with a wave of the hand. "London is vast," he says. "London is an enormous city, an enormous English city. But New York is a world metropolis, unquestionably transcendent." Before Ibañez sailed for Paris on the steamer La France he sat in his suite at the Hotel America and talked of his impressions of America. "I like America," he said. "Not only because you Americans have received me so cordially, but because the country and people are interesting. Your customs, your cosmopolitan types, your characteristics, architecture, progressiveness—all are interesting. You are the greatest nation in the world."

The Germans with their indemnity are really more fortunate than the New Yorker with his rent, says an economist with an eye for comparisons. The annual indemnity payment is $750,000,000, about twice the amount extracted from New York tenants, but there are twelve times more Germans to pay it. The indemnity is fixed; the New Yorker's rent is subject to spasmodic increase. The indemnity ceases in thirty years; the New York rent tribute never.

INDIVIDUALITIES.

W. D. Clark, thirty-three years of age, a trapper from the Arctic, saw street-cars, automobiles, and skyscrapers for the first time in his life when he visited Vancouver, British Columbia. "I would not exchange a part of my vast Arctic Circle for all this. I hope to be back north before August," he said.

In the Chicago convention, where Senator Warren G. Harding and Governor Calvin Coolidge were nominated, respectively, by the Republican party for the race for the presidency and vice-presidency, Alexandra Carlisle Pfeiffer, known on the stage as Alexandra Carlisle, made one of the seconding speeches in the nomination of Governor Coolidge.

A Paris dispatch tells of the safe arrival in that city of Mrs. Richard Mansfield, widow of the famous actor, and Colin Clements, the poet and playwright. They have been in Armenia for the past year doing relief work, and were held prisoners by the Turks at Urfa, Mesopotamia, for three months. They escaped to Jerusalem, and came from there to Paris, via Aleppo.

Frank Bacon, playwright and novelist, is quite the same whimsical, boyish, fun-loving "Bake" that the folks back in California used to know. True, the folks are a bit surprised by the developments of the last two years. "When I first went away from home to get into the wicked play-acting game," he recalled, smiling, "my father was convinced that I had disgraced the whole family. 'Frank,' he wrote to me, 'the whole town is talking about you.' San Jose wasn't such a big town, but a scandal could get about there fast."

Postmaster-General Burleson has long boasted of the fact that he has never attended a professional game of baseball and does not propose to attend one. To see hundreds of men gathered in front of a bulletin board getting baseball returns throws the Postmaster-General into a mild rage. "Those loafers," he always observes on such occasion, "ought to be at work down on my farm." Which is doubly rough on the baseball fans. For Burleson's farm of 800 acres is rented to the State of Texas, and is cultivated by penitentiary prisoners.

Mr. Gunnar Brandel of the College of Business, Stockholm, is a prospective banker, taking a two years' course in practical and theoretic banking at the National City Bank in New York from the considerably smaller city of Stockholm. What struck him most strongly was the fact that many good Americans knew nothing of the dirt and misery prevailing in certain quarters. He himself is learning that much that is said of Americans is exaggeration, as, for instance, our reputation for always being busy. Any nation has a right to be proud of the characteristic of taking joy in work, which he finds among us.

A little more than a year ago the voters of Dallas, Texas, went to the polls and elected Captain Frank W. Wozencraft, then twenty-six years old, mayor of their city, giving him a clear majority in thirty-two precincts out of thirty-six. As far as records show, Wozencraft is the youngest mayor in the United States, and his first year as chief executive of a city of nearly 200,000 people has been filled with original projects, all carried out with boyish enthusiasm, which have made him well known in every part of Texas. Wozencraft was graduated from the University of Texas in 1914, and for three years, until he entered the army, he was in the legal department of the telephone company.

His majesty the King of Siam is one of the most interesting monarchs. The first bachelor that ever sat upon the Siamese throne, he is said to be waiting for an American girl to share his throne. The king's grandfather, Maha Mongkut, used to say that he desired—and had—a member of every family of note in his kingdom in his "household." No outsider ever knew just how many wives he did have. His son, Maha Chulalongkorn, the father of the present king, had three wives on the day before he was made crown prince. On that day he married ninety-seven more to make up the complement of one hundred, which was the proper number of wives for the crown prince to have. When he died—ten years ago—he had between 7000 and 8000. When his son, the then crown prince, returned from his long stay in Europe, he had spent a third of his life in England, France, Germany, and Russia, and had made frequent visits to Belgium, Italy, Spain, Norway, Sweden, and the Netherlands.

William Morris Davis is one of the most celebrated geographers in the world today, and the Swedish Anthropological and Geographical Society has just bestowed on him its highest decoration. He was born at Philadelphia on February 12, 1850, and the first words he uttered after casting a calculating look over his surroundings, were: "Please bring me a book on elementary science, or if that is not available a good gazetteer, or at the worst a railroad time-table." He has lived in the world of geography and geology ever since his student days, which were a long time ago. He was nineteen when he got his S. B. at St. Lawrence Scientific School (Harvard), and a year later was M. E. at the same institute. Since then he has dropped in at the University of the Cape of Good Hope, where they made him a Doctor of Science; at the University of Melbourne, where he gathered an S. D.; at the University of Christiania, where he was made a Ph. D., and at the University of Greifswald, where he got a similar honor.

OLD FAVORITES.

The Cataract of Lodore.

"How does the water Come down at Lodore?"
My little boy asked me
Thus, once on a time;
And moreover he tasked me
To tell him in rhyme.

Anon at the word,
There first came one daughter,
And then came another,
To second and third

The request of their brother,
And to hear how the water
Comes down at Lodore,
With its rush and its roar;

As many a time
They had seen it before.
So I told them in rhyme,
For of rhymes I had store;
And 'twas in my vocation
For their recreation
That so I should sing;
Because I was Laureate
To them and the King.

From its sources which well
In the tarn on the fell;
From its fountains
In the mountains,
Its rills and its gills;

Through moss and through brake,
It runs and it creeps
For a while till it sleeps
In its own little lake.

And thence at departing,
Awakening and starting,
It runs through the reeds,
And away it proceeds,

Through meadow and glade,
In sun and in shade,
And through the wood-shelter,
Among crags in its flurry,
Helter-skelter,
Hurry-scurry,

Here it comes sparkling,
And there it lies darkling;
Now smoking and frothing
Its tumult and wrath in,
Till, in this rapid race
On which it is bent,
It reaches the place
Of its steep descent.

The cataract strong
Then plunges along,
Striking and raging,
As if a war raging
Its caverns and rocks among;

Rising and leaping,
Sinking and creeping,
Swelling and sweeping,
Showering and springing,
Flying and flinging,

Writhing and wringing,
Eddying and whisking,
Spouting and frisking,
Turning and twisting
Around and around
With endless rebound:

Smiting and fighting,
A sight to delight in:
Confounding, astounding,
Dizzying and deafening the ear with its sound.

Collecting, projecting,
Receding and speeding,
And shocking and rocking,
And darting and parting,
And threading and spreading,
And whizzing and hissing,
And dripping and skipping,
And hitting and splitting,
And shining and twining,
And rattling and rattling,
And shaking and quaking,
And pouring and roaring,
And waving and raving,
And tossing and crossing,
And flowing and going,
And running and stunning,
And foaming and roaming,
And dinnning and spinning,
And dropping and hopping,
And working and jerking,
And guggling and struggling,
And heaving and cleaving,
And moaning and groaning;

And glittering and frittering,
And gathering and feathering,
And whitening and brightening,
And quivering and shivering,
And hurrying and skurrying,
And thundering and floundering;

Dividing and gliding and sliding,
And falling and hawling and sprawling,
And driving and riving and striving,
And sprinkling and twinkling and wrinkling,
And sounding and hounding and rounding,
And huddling and troubling and doubling,
And grumpling and rumbling and tumbling,
And clattering and hattering and shattering;

Retreating and heating and meeting and sheeting,
Delaying and straying and playing and spraying,
Advancing and prancing and glancing and dancing,
Recoiling, turmoiling and toiling and boiling,
And gleaming and streaming and steaming and heaming,
And rushing and flushing and brushing and gushing,
And flapping and rapping and clapping and slapping,
And curling and whirling and purling and twirling,
And thumping and plumping and humping and jumping,
And dashing and flashing and splashing and clashing;
And so never ending, but always descending,
Sounds and motions forever and ever are blending,
All at once and all o'er, with a mighty uproar,—
And this way the water comes down at Lodore.

JAMES McNEIL WHISTLER.

E. R. and J. Pennell Produce a New and Enlarged Edition of Their Biography.

It is pleasant to see that the life of Whistler by E. R. and J. Pennell has reached a new edition. It is one of the few biographies that are nearly ideal in form and structure. The authors tell us that in preparing the new issue they have added fresh material and illustrations as well as collecting and verifying documents. The book has been published in French, and but for the war it would have appeared in other languages. For the name and fame of Whistler have steadily grown and we are told that endless stories of him either garbled from this book or invented have gone from end to end of the world.

The authors wisely curtail the account of Whistler's early life. The forbears of great men are usually uninteresting, the eugenists to the contrary. And so, early in the book, we have an account of Whistler's intimacy with Rossetti. Watts-Dunton says that Rossetti got tired of Whistler after a time and considered him a brainless fellow who had no more than a malicious wit at the expense of others. This may be exaggerated, and certainly the two men had many points of agreement:

Whistler and Rossetti also agreed about many of the group who met at Tudor House, though eventually Whistler felt what appeared to him the disloyalty of Swinburne and Tudor-Jones. He was never, at any time, so intimate with Burne-Jones as with Swinburne, who often came to the house in Lindsey Row, not only for Whistler's sake, but out of affection for Whistler's mother. Miss Chapman tells us that Swinburne was once taken ill there suddenly, and Mrs. Whistler nursed him till he was well. Miss Chapman also remembers Swinburne sitting at Mrs. Whistler's feet, and saying to her: "Mrs. Whistler, what has happened? It used to be Algernon!" Mrs. Whistler, who had accepted Whistler's friends and their ways, said quietly, "You have not been to see us for a long while, you know. If you come as you did, it will be Algernon again." And he came, and the friendship lasted until the eighties, when he published an article in the Fortnightly Review which Whistler could not forgive.

It was the sight of Whistler's "Mother" that decided Carlyle to sit for his picture. He seemed to see a certain fitness of things in the simplicity of it, the old lady sitting with her hands in her lap. Carlyle told people that he sat there talking and talking and that Whistler went on working and working and paid no attention to him whatever:

Before the portrait was finished, Whistler had begun to paint Miss Alexander, and another story is of a meeting at the door between the old man coming out and the little girl going in. "Who is that?" he asked the maid. "Miss Alexander, who is sitting to Mr. Whistler." Carlyle shook his head. "Puir lassie! Puir lassie!" Mrs. Leyland at whose portrait also Whistler was working, remembered that Carlyle grumbled a good deal. Whistler, in the end, had, it is said, to get Phil Morris to sit for the coat. Walter Greaves' memories are of impatience in the studio, especially when Carlyle saw Whistler working with small brushes, so that Whistler either worked with big brushes or pretended to. William Allingham wrote of the sittings in his diary:

"Carlyle tells me he is sitting to Whistler. If C. makes signs of changing his position, W. screams out in an agonized tone: 'For God's sake, don't move!' C. afterwards said that all W.'s anxiety seemed to be to get the coat painted to ideal perfection; the face went for little. He had begun by asking two or three sittings, but managed to get a great many. At last C. flatly rebelled. He used to define W. as the most absurd creature on the face of the earth."

When success came to Whistler it came abundantly. The fashionable world, and royalty, crowded through his open doors. Whistler's manner of work was an astonishment. He would look at his canvas steadily for twenty minutes or half an hour and suddenly dash at it and give it one touch, saying, "There, well, I think that will do for today." But Whistler knew what popularity meant and he could not afford to have many friends:

If the frequent use of the name "Jimmie" by people in speaking and writing of him implies a friendliness on his part with every Tom, Dick, and Harry, nothing could be further from the fact. His friends, who were his contemporaries, called him "Jimmie," but rarely to his face, and the rest who did once had not the courage to a second time. We remember a foolish youth who, meeting him at our table, addressed him in free and easy fashion as "Whistler." He said nothing. He only looked, but the youth did not forget the Mr. after that. Whistler was the last man to allow familiarity or to make friends. He understood how to keep at a distance those he did not know or did not want to know.

But Whistler delighted in society. He was as careful of his dress and his hair as a woman. And he devoted no less attention to his breakfasts and his dinners that made the talk of the town. He ate little, but that little had to be perfect both in cooking and serving:

From the beginning at Lindsey Row he gave these breakfasts and dinners. Mr. Luke Ionides remembers calling one afternoon when "Jimmy was busy putting things straight: he asked me if I had any money. I told him I had twelve shillings. He said that was enough. We went out together, and he bought three chairs at two-and-sixpence each, and three bottles of claret at eighteenpence each, and three sticks of sealing-wax of different colors at twopence each. On our return he sealed the top of each bottle with a different colored wax. He then told me he expected a possible huyet to dinner, and two other friends. When we had taken our seats at the table, he very solemnly told the maid to go down and bring up a bottle of wine, one of those with the red seal. The maid could hardly suppress a grin, but I alone saw it. Then, after the meat, he told her to fetch a bottle with the blue seal; and with dessert the one with the yellow seal was brought, and all were drunk with perfect innocence and delight. He sold his picture, and said he was sure the sealing-wax had done it."

Whistler had the faculty of being late when invited to dinner. One official evening he arrived an hour after the time. "We are so hungry, Mr. Whistler!" said his host. "What a good sign!" was his answer. At times he felt "like a little devil," and he tells us of one of these occasions:

"I arrived. In the middle of the drawing-room table was the new Fortnightly Review, wet from the press; in it was an article on Meryon by Wedmore, and there was Wedmore—the distinguished guest. I felt the excitement over the great man, and the great things he had been doing. Wedmore took the hostess in to dinner; I was on her other side, seeing things, bent on making the most of them. And I talked of critics, of Wedmore, as though I did not know who sat opposite. And I was nudged, my foot kicked under the table. But I talked. And whenever the conversation turned on Meryon, or Wedmore's article, or other serious things, I told another story, and I laughed—ha ha!—and they couldn't help it, and they all laughed with me, and Wedmore was forgotten, and I was the hero of the evening. And Wedmore has never forgiven me."

The authors give us an account of the libel suit brought by Whistler against Ruskin for a criticism that passed the limits of the legitimate. Whistler won his suit, but was awarded only a farthing damages and, moreover, he had to pay his own costs:

Arthur Severn wrote us that, at the Ruskin trial, he "was on the opposite side, although my sympathies were rather with Whistler, whose 'Nocturne in Black and Gold' I knew to be carefully painted. Whenever we met he was most courteous, understanding my position. During the trial one of the Nocturnes was handed across the court over the people's heads, so that Whistler might verify it as his work. On its way, an old gentleman with a bald head got a tap from the frame, then the picture showed signs of falling out of its frame, and when Serjeant Parry turned to Whistler and said, 'Is that your work, Mr. Whistler?' the artist, putting his eyeglass up and with his slight American twang, said, 'Well, it was, but if it goes on much longer in that way, I don't think it will be.' And when Ruskin's Titian was shown, 'Oh, come, we've had enough of those Whistlers,' said a jurymen. I thought Whistler looked anxious whilst the jury was away. Another trial came on so as not to waste time. The court was dark, and candles had to be brought in—it seemed to be about some rope, and huge coils were on the solicitors' table. A stupid clerk was being examined. Nothing intelligent could be got out of him, and at last Mr. Day, one of the counsel (afterwards the judge), said, 'Give him the rope's end,' which produced great laughter in court, in which Whistler heartily joined. Then, suddenly, a hush fell; the jury returned a verdict for Whistler, damages one farthing."

We have some extracts from Mr. Cole's diary, one of them relating to Whistler's quarrel with Lady Meux, who said to him after some impertinence, "See here, Jimmy Whistler! You keep a civil tongue in that head of yours, or I will have some one in to finish those portraits you have made of me." Elsewhere Mr. Cole says:

"Whistler was a most entertaining companion; he was very fond of telling us Edgar Allan Poe's stories, and also of reciting 'The Lost Lenore,' which he said was his favorite poem. He dined with us several times in Lyall Street; he was always late for dinner, sometimes half an hour, and I think on more than one occasion was sound asleep at the table before the end of the dinner."

"Whistler's usual breakfast, which he often had after we arrived at the studio, was two eggs in a tumbler, beaten up with pepper, salt, and vinegar, bread and coffee."

"Whistler stood yards away from the picture with his brush, and would move it as though he were painting; he would then jump across the room, and put a dab of paint on the canvas; he also used to wet his finger and gently rub portions of his picture. I have often seen him take a sponge with soap and water and wash the Blue Girl's face (on the canvas, I mean)."

For a time there was great intimacy between Whistler and Oscar Wilde. Whistler went with him everywhere. At receptions the company divided into two groups, the one round Whistler, the other round Wilde:

The trouble began when Whistler discovered how small was Wilde's knowledge of art: he could never endure anybody in the studio who did not understand. Whistler wrote of Wilde as a man "with no more sense of a picture than of the fit of a coat." "The Gentle Art" shows that Whistler was furious with Wilde's borrowing from him. That Wilde took his good where he found it is neither more nor less than what has always been done—what Whistler did. But the genius, from the good thus taken, evolves something of his own. Wilde was content to shine personally and let the great things expected of him wait. When it was a question of wit, there was no one to whom Wilde could go except Whistler. It is all expressed in the old story: "I wish I had said that, Whistler." "You will, Oscar, you will." In matters of art Wilde had everything to learn from Whistler, who, though ever generous, resented Wilde's preaching in the provinces the truths which he had taught for years. This is all in "The Gentle Art." "Oscar" had "the courage of the opinions . . . of others!" and again: "Oscar went forth as my St. John, but, forgetting that humility should be his chief characteristic and unable to withstand the unaccustomed respect with which his utterances were received, he not only trifled with my shoe, but bolted with the latchet!"

Wilde used to filch Whistler's good sayings from him and retail them as his own, and the public was disposed to believe that the process was the other way about. And this naturally exasperated Whistler:

If Whistler ever played Pierrot, it was with a purpose. Where art was concerned he was serious. Wilde was serious about nothing. His two topics were "self and art," and his interest in both was part of his bid for notoriety. He might jest about himself, but flippancy, if art was his subject, was to Whistler a crime. The only way he showed his resentment was by refusing to take Wilde seriously about anything. Even when Wilde was married, he was not allowed to forget, for Whistler telegraphed to the church, "Fear I may not be able to reach you in time for the ceremony. Don't wait." Later, in Paris, he called Wilde "Oscar, bourgeois malgré lui," a witicism none could appreciate better than the Parisians. As soon as he began to make a jest of Wilde he ended the companionship to which, while it lasted, London society owed much gaiety.

Walter Sickert tells us amusingly of the little coterie of worshippers that always surrounded Whistler, content to be his servants so long as they might be in his society:

Mr. Sickert tells another story. He and Whistler were once printing etchings together, when the former dropped a copper plate. "How like you!" said Whistler. Five minutes afterwards the improbable happened. Whistler, who was never clumsy, dropped one himself. There was a pause. "How unlike me!" was his remark.

Whistler went on a European tour with Chase, and Chase says that he found him a delightful companion. They went to Belgium and Holland, and here it is that Whistler expounds his views of the Germans:

On the journey from Antwerp to Amsterdam two Germans were in the train: "Well, you know, colonel, if the Almighty ever made a mistake it was when he created the German!" Whistler said at the end of a few minutes. Chase told him that if he could speak German he might understand their interesting talk. Whistler answered in fluent German and talked nothing else, until, at Haarlem, Chase could endure it no longer and left. Whistler leaned out of the window as the train started, "Think it over, Chase, and tomorrow morning you will come on to Amsterdam, and you'll tell me that I'm right about the Germans!"

We have already heard of Whistler's strange view that the purchaser of a picture is not entitled to possess it, but only to borrow it now and then. Chase had expressed surprise at Whistler's refusal to deliver a picture to a lady who had bought it, and then Whistler explained:

"You know, Chase, the people don't really want anything beautiful. They fill a room by chance with beautiful things, and some little trumpery something over the mantelpiece gives the whole damned show away. And if they pay a hundred pounds or so for a picture, they think it belongs to them. Well—why—it should only be theirs for a while: hung on their walls that they may rejoice in it and then returned." Once, it is said, a lady drove up to the studio and told him: "I have bought one of your pictures, it is beautiful, but as it is always at exhibitions I never see it. But I'm told you have it." "Dear lady," said Whistler, "you have been misinformed. It is not here." And she drove away. Later he found it: "H'm, she was right about one thing, it is beautiful. But because she's paid hundreds of pounds for it, she thinks she ought to have it all the time. She's lucky if she gets it now and then."

Whistler belonged to the Society of British Artists, whose practice it was to provide a feast for the critics on opening day. Press day, the dearest in the year at the Royal Academy, was the most delightful at the British Artists'. Mr. Sidney Starr tells a story of one, when Whistler had not hung his picture, but only the frame:

"Telegrams were sent imploring the placing of the canvas. But the only answer that came was, 'The Press have ye always with you; feed my lambs.' A smoking-concert followed during the exhibition. At this, one critic said to the Master, 'Your picture is not up to your mark, it is not good this time.' 'You shouldn't say it isn't good; you should say you don't like it, and then, you know, you're perfectly safe; now come and have something you do like, have some whisky,' said Whistler."

The city of Glasgow was anxious to possess Whistler's portrait of Carlyle, but the price was a thousand guineas, and a deputation from the corporation came to call on him in London. Whistler described the interview:

"I received them, well, you know, charmingly, of course. And one who spoke for the rest asked me if I did not think I was putting a large price on the picture—one thousand guineas. And I said, 'Yes, perhaps, if you will have it so!' And he said that it seemed to the council excessive; why, the figure was not even life-size. And I agreed, 'But, you know, I said, 'few men are life-size.' And that was all. It was an official occasion, and I respected it. Then they asked me to think over the matter until the next day, and they would come again. And they came. And they said, 'Have you thought of the thousand guineas and what we said about it, Mr. Whistler?' And I said, 'Why, gentlemen, why—well, you know, how could I think of anything but the pleasure of seeing you again?' And, naturally, being gentlemen, they understood, and they gave me a cheque for the thousand guineas."

Whistler was often embarrassed by the visitors who came to see him, and sometimes he resented the intrusion of those who were actuated only by curiosity. Mr. Eddy tells a story to this effect:

"An acquaintance had brought, without invitation, a friend, 'a distinguished and clever woman,' to the studio in the Rue Notre-Dame-des-Champs. They reached the door, both out of breath from their long climb. 'Ah, my dear Whistler,' drawled C., 'I have taken the liberty of bringing Lady D.—to see you. I knew you would be delighted.' 'Delighted, I'm sure! Quite beyond expression, but—mysteriously, and holding the door so as to bar their entrance—my dear Lady D.—I would never forgive our friend for bringing you up six flights of stairs on so hot a day to visit a studio at one of these—eh—pagan moments when—and he glanced furtively behind him, and still further closed the door—it is absolutely impossible for a lady to be received. Upon my soul, I should never forgive him.' And Whistler bowed them down from the top of the six flights and returned to the portrait of a very sedate old gentleman who had taken advantage of the interruption to break for a moment the rigor of his pose."

It would be possible to quote at great length from this anecdotal storehouse and with the comfortable conviction that it contains nothing apocryphal. It is one of the best biographies that has yet seen the light.

THE LIFE OF JAMES McNEIL WHISTLER. By E. R. and J. Pennell. Philadelphia: J. B. Lippincott Company: $6.50.

With a total population of 31,000 in western Samoa, of which less than 1000 are whites or half castes, the demand in confectionery is mainly for hard candies, better known locally as boiled lollies, retailing at 25 cents a pound. These are small varieties, differing in color and flavor, and imported in five-pound tins. Lozenges are little known. Taffies and chocolates suffer from the extreme humidity of the climate, which makes necessary their being imported in sealed metal tins, tailing at from 50 to 75 cents a pound.

BANKING AND INVESTMENT NEWS.

San Francisco's bank clearings for the week ending July 24, 1920, were $155,200,000; for the corresponding week of last year, $147,000,000; a gain of $8,200,000.

Gold held by member banks increased $6,011,000 to $58,697,000 during the week ending July 23d, according to the weekly statement of the Federal Reserve Bank of San Francisco, issued Saturday. Total gold reserves declined $4,359,000 to $172,039,000 as compared with the previous week.

Total resources dropped $10,265,000, while bills on hand gained $4,107,000 to $192,797,000, which may be due to the noted increase in bills secured by government war obligation. Total earning assets were higher by $2,061,000.

Government experts estimate the condition of all our crops this year at only three-tenths ment bureaus are supposed to be figuring out such changes in railway wages and traffic rates as will relieve the whole situation. If the results are unfavorable the business situation will be precarious in the extreme.

Meanwhile the steel and iron and other metal industries are practically marking time. Purchases are more and more on a hand-to-mouth basis, which is not without its good side, owing to the movement to deflate credit.

E. H. Rollins & Sons are offering a block of Province of Saskatchewan 5 per cent. bonds, due September, 1932, at a price to yield 7 1/4 per cent. Interest and principal of this issue are payable in New York in United States gold coin.

According to the most recent available figures, this province has a net per capita debt of only $22, which is the lowest of any province in Western Canada. Saskatchewan ranks first in Canada as a grain producer, second in railroad mileage, and third in population.

Combined resources of the state banking institutions of California operating in San Francisco were $455,523,591, as made public recently in the report of condition as of June 30th, issued by the state banking department. Of this total the savings banks had resources amounting to $380,029,879; commercial banks had $161,666,567, and the trust companies, $3,827,144.

It was reported that actual cash on hand was $15,808,046, while individual deposits in all the state banks in San Francisco on the date of the report aggregated $452,157,177.

The effect of the wage award upon the payrolls of Pacific Coast railroads is indicated in estimates made at the general offices of the Southern Pacific Company that the added bill for all that company's lines alone would approximate $17,500,000. The exact figures remain to be determined, but it was said that the figure quoted was believed to be very nearly correct. Officials pointed out that stockholders of the Southern Pacific last year received in dividends $17,478,460, so that this one recent wage increase distributed among the company's employees equals the amount that the stockholders got altogether. There are over 50,000 employees on the Pacific system lines.

At the same time it was pointed out that the Southern's Pacific's annual report, recently published, showed that the increase in wages and cost of materials used in operation in 1919, compared with the year previous, amounted to $18,833,500, or an increase of almost one and one-half millions of dollars more than the stockholders received.

Commenting on the situation, a statement issued from the office of President William Sproule read in part:

"The stockholders of the railroads have not had any share in the increased revenues arising from any source, whether increased volume of business or from higher freight and passenger rates. The dividend rate on no large system has been increased for many years. The Southern Pacific stockholders got 6 per cent. in 1919, just as they did in 1914; but this actually means out of every dollar earned by the Southern Pacific the share that goes to the stockholders is 40 per cent. less in 1919 than it was in 1914.

"The progress of taxation in railroad affairs is also graphically represented by comparing 1911 with 1919. In 1911 for every dollar paid the stockholders of the Southern Pacific about 33 cents went for taxes; but in 1919 for every dollar the stockholders received the company paid out 73 cents in taxes. Taxes increased from $5,461,570 in 1911 to $12,842,270 in 1919.

"The new increases in freight and passenger rates are due directly to the increased cost of operations: first, wages; second, higher cost of materials used in operations, and third, taxes. The fourth item is the necessity of providing revenue by taking care of the interest charges on money borrowed to furnish more locomotives, cars, additional tracks, terminals, and other facilities to give a better service."

"The gross earnings from all sources exceeded $260,550,000 in 1919, out of which the stockholders received $17,478,460. In 1914 gross revenues were $152,623,950, out of which the stockholders received $16,361,090. The increase in dividends was not due to an increase in rate, but to an increase in capital stock, the bondholders having exchanged some of their 4 per cent. and 5 per cent. bonds for capital stock under their rights as bondholders."

The crop-moving season, during which the country's credit requirements reach their maximum intensity, is now close at hand. Because of the difficulties of transportation, it may be expected that the volume of credit needed this year to finance crop marketing will be larger than usual (says the National Bank of Commerce, New York, in a statement regarding current market conditions). While the traffic movement has improved slightly, sufficient relief can hardly be expected to the extent necessary to permit of the clearing away of existing congestion and the resumption of a normal movement of agricultural staples in the fall. The crops, to an unusual extent, may have to be held this year. Recent experience has demonstrated fully the effect of any interference with orderly commodity shipments in tying up an enormous volume of credit.

This prospect enhances the importance of the credit situation, which, during the current period of June 16th to July 15th, has experienced no relief from the tension of the past several months. Since last November the Federal Reserve institutions and member banks have been seeking to curtail non-essential borrowing, to limit loans to necessary requirements and to reduce gradually the volume of outstanding credit. In the former of these aims they have in large measure been successful and there can be no question of the underlying soundness of the general credit structure. There has thus far, however, been no reduction of the aggregate volume of credit outstanding. The efforts of the banks have simply limited further credit expansion and the volume of credit at the beginning of July exceeded that outstanding at the close of 1919. The failure to effect a normal credit liquidation before the commencement of the crop-moving demands has in large measure been due to transportation difficulties which have obstructed free commodity movements and occasioned the credit stringency which became pronounced earlier in the year.

Were the banks still operating under the old banking system, the outlook would be serious. But since the banking power of the country has become well coordinated under the Federal Reserve system, with its flexibility for meeting such a situation, there is no reason to apprehend serious difficulty in caring for essential credit requirements during the approaching season. In this connection it may be noted that the steady outflow of gold from this country has been supplanted at least temporarily by a moderate net inward movement of the metal, and this in a measure relieves one source of pressure against credit facilities. Commercial and industrial credit requirements, moreover, may be expected to become somewhat less pressing should the tendencies toward price recessions and reduced volume of business, which are discussed hereafter, continue. While credit will be available to meet the country's essential requirements, there continues to be no prospect of its being available except for such use.

Further slight declines in the wholesale prices of most commodities in which reductions were already in progress continued during the month from June 16th to July 15th. The downward movement extended to some lines in which it was not evident a month ago, among them not only raw materials, but some classes of manufactures, and further noteworthy declines seem not unlikely in the future. The beneficial effects which will eventually accrue from the reestablishment of business on sane, conservative lines will far outweigh the temporary hardships which result, although conditions may become temporarily difficult for some sections of the business community.

C. H. Zentini & Co., dealers in foreign investments and securities, say the German mark is selling at such a discount that a slight improvement in the rate of exchange will yield a large profit on the money invested. The German mark could easily improve to many times its present cost, while the exchange rate of other countries would increase only 20 per cent. or 30 per cent. Consequently an investment in German marks offers the greatest chance for profit and it is thought that Germany's financial and economic condition will continue to steadily improve.

People who have soft-pedaled the sugar bowl for six years may be interested in the statement that crop conditions on July 1st promised an increase in next fall's sugar production in the United States: an increase amounting to, approximately, 333,000 tons, or enough to load a train of freight cars seventy or seventy-five miles long, allowing forty tons per car. This prospective crop is equal to more than twenty-two pounds of sugar for every man, woman, and child within the United States, and the increase over last year equals more than six pounds per person. The sugar-heat crop this year covers almost a million acres as against the five-year average of about two-thirds of a million; and the growing condition on July 1st was above the ten-year average. There is more than half a million acres of sugar cane this year, about half of which is intended for sugar and the other half for syrup, after deducting considerable amounts for planting the next crop. There is a substantial increase in acreage over last year, especially in Louisiana, where nearly all the cane sugar of the United States is made. The growing condition of the cane in Louisiana is much better than last year, but considerably under the average for the past nine years. The United States Department of Agriculture, which has carried on a number of projects looking toward making this country self-sustaining from a sugar standpoint, is co-operating with other agencies in protecting the crops from insects and disease and otherwise promoting the production and utilization of a humber sugar crop. It should be borne in mind, however, that the forecast for 1920 is based upon conditions on July 1st, and the actual outcome would be above or below this forecast according as condition between July 1st and harvest are better or worse than average.

It can not be denied that sound financial depend upon sound economic conditions. For nearly eight years our national government has violated every economic law created by the experience of ages (says the Wells Fargo Nevada National Bank in their monthly letter). Its grossest blunder was in endeavoring to establish by law a universal eight-hour day. This move of the government will, in the end, be as disastrous to the wage-earner as to the wage-payer. Already it has destroyed the morale of the employee. It has created a shortage of labor which, while business remains active, has made labor, organized and unorganized, overbearing, independent, defiant, and not subject to discipline. In time the universal eight-hour day, coupled with the Resumption of trading in wheat is being watched with intense interest in the trade. The improved crop outlook is not without its drawback now, for rust is appearing rather plentifully in the Northwest, where the crop must go through many critical days before out of danger. It will take some time for the wheat market to gain its bearings, and, of course, other grains will be influenced by its fluctuations. The Russian situation is so kaleidoscopic that it is difficult to estimate what influence Russia will have on this year's prices. Both South America and Australia seem to be out of it as exporting countries until the next crop.

The cotton market becomes easily oversold. Boll weevil time is at hand, and this will make for increasing timidity on the part of the bears.

The railway traffic situation is so abnormal as to amount to a real calamity. Freight movements are seriously restricted because of lack of cars, and this includes shipments from steel mills to car manufacturing concerns. It is not surprising that business sentiment should be seriously affected when the arteries of trade are clogged up. Meanwhile govern-government's criminal waste of money, its wilful extravagance, its resort to grinding methods of raising revenue, will kill business initiative, destroy industry, and curtail industrial output. It has already paralyzed our transportation system. A serious fuel famine for all manufacturing centres is predicted for the coming winter. Then manufacturing plants, now running on half-time, or less, will close down. Unemployment, on a vast scale, will result. Suffering will ensue. Business men will become bankrupt. Production will be further curtailed. The country will then be compelled to withstand the wrath of that portion of our population who expected a millennium to result from the enforcement of luxury upon the laboring classes, for that is what the eight-hour day has done. Interest rates will go higher. It will be hard for the government to raise the revenue required for its expenses and extravagant operations by reason of the shortage in business and profits. Not a cheerful picture, but one which we will be liable to see before the close of 1920. When hard times against stare us in the face, as a bar to the quick recovery therefrom, the debt of the United States, of something like $25,000,000,000, will be quite effective. No matter how business shrinks, the interest on the debt must be met. The burden is a heavy one. The public has followed the example of the government in violating economic laws.

The stock market has entered the latter half of the year in a hulloish frame of mind, which is hardly surprising in view of the extent of the accumulation of cheap stocks by strong financial interests during May and June.

How far the advance in prices will go will probably depend upon the money situation. The bank statements do not indicate any prospect for that sort of money market ease that would suggest a long-continued rise in prices. We are having some gold imports from week to week which are in the main related to the maturity of the Anglo-French bonds in the fall, and it looks as if our gold reserves would be built up very considerably before the turn of the year.

One thing that would help the money situation more definitely than any other would be increasing freedom in the movement of freight. Seldom in our history has so much credit been tied up as there is at present in all manner of commodities that have been sold and for one reason or another are not being delivered. The talk of wholesale closing down of steel mills in this connection, however, would seem to have small foundation in fact, but, naturally, if the present situation continues much longer it will result in curtail in production. This would leave, however, just so much larger unsupplied demand that sooner or later must be taken care of.

The market so far since the turn of prices a month or more ago has run fairly true to form. It was the industrials, and particularly the more volatile of them, that were taken in hand first and advanced sharply, and after they had seemingly run their course, the rails, and especially the low-priced ones, which are so much easier to move than the standard issues, have been pushed to the front by bull operators. Intermittent switching by the trading element from one stock or group of stocks to another has made for a great deal of irregularity at times, and profit-taking reactions have been emphasized by bearish activity.

Indeed the bear party in the market seems again to be figuring rather largely in the transactions, and this would seem to make it easier for the bull pools to bring about radical advances in the list.

"Many people are buying themselves rich in the security market." These words, uttered recently by a New York banker, are worthy of repetition in print, for—

... Words are things, and a small drop of ink. Falling like dew upon a thought, produces That which makes thousands, perhaps millions think.

And hence these words there is a thought which, if stirred to life, will help to solve many of our problems of today.

Those who are old enough can remember how the well-to-do-ness of certain frugal people of their home towns dated from a few years after the civil war. The foundations of many moderate fortunes were laid in wise investing at that time. It was that which the hanker had in mind when he said many people are today buying themselves rich in the security market.

A dollar today will buy only 45 cents' worth of food or clothing as compared with 1913. But the same dollar will buy $1.37 worth of high-grade bonds as compared with their pre-war prices. In other words, money will go three times as far in making investments as it will in buying anything else today. There have not been such opportunities as this for investors before in this generation. For instance, one of the largest investment banking houses in the country recently marked down the selling prices of the bonds which it had on hand to lower levels than it had paid for them. This is truly the day of the investor.

High-grade railroad bonds, such as New York Central 3½, due 1997, for example, sold as high as 111½ twenty years ago. The day this was written they sold at 62½. The security of the bond is as good as it was twenty years ago—better in fact. The cause of the decline has been outside of the security itself and has affected all bonds.

The officers of savings banks and individual investors who bought bonds at ten points above par around the opening of the century can not be criticized for lack of conservatism. But they must sympathize with for having had the realizable value of their investment cut nearly in half. On the other hand, those who sold long-term bonds at that time and have kept their funds in short-term securities since, or in some other investment where they can now get the full amount out again, are to be congratulated, as are all others who now have money to invest. They are in position to take advantage of the present low prices for long-term bonds and buy a higher income return than has been available since the civil war, and one which will continue at the same level until the bonds mature. This is the day of opportunity for those who have money to invest.

Some of the declines that have taken place in long-term bonds are illustrated below:

Bond Issue	High Since 1900	Present Price
Ach., T. & S. F. gen. mort. 4s, due 1993	106	70¾
Chic. & N. W. gen. mort. 3½s, due 1987	111	60½
New York Central ref. 3½s, due 1997	111	62½
Nor. & West. first consol. 4s, due 1996	104½	70
Nor. Pacific prior lien 4s, due 1997	106¾	70½
Union Pacific first mort. 4s, due 1947	108½	76¾

The Union Pacific first mortgage 4s sell higher than the other bonds in the list because of their earlier maturity date when they will be paid off at par. The "yield" which they give to maturity is approximately the same as on the other bonds in the list. If prices swing back above par, then the shorter-term bonds, because of their earlier maturity, will not sell as high as the longer-term issues on the same "yield" basis.

The causes back of this long downward swing in bond prices, which was greatly accelerated after the outbreak of the world war, are the same as those back of the increase in the cost of living. When it costs people more to buy food and clothing, they demand a higher return on their money when they invest it. That is why bond prices go down as living costs go up, why the dollar today as compared with the pre-war dollar will buy three times as much in bonds as it will in commodities. It takes more in bonds, or rather in the income from them, to buy as much commodities as before.

As living costs come down, the fixed interest return on long-term bonds will buy more, and bonds will advance in price. When the swing in this other direction will start no one can tell, but start soon it seems it must. For those who have money to invest the present seems the time to place it in long-term bonds. When United States government bonds are selling to yield more than 5½ per cent., and the Pennsylvania Railroad and the New York Central are selling 7 per cent. securities, no regrets are likely to be felt by the investor who makes sure of securing for himself for a long period of years the high return that long-term bonds now give. There may never in this generation be again such an opportunity to use money that will buy so little of everything else to buy so many bonds, the return from which may grow in purchasing power for years to come.—Century Magazine.

With the chartering of the Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers' Cooperative Bank at Cleveland a labor union joins issue with capital in its own field and undertakes a task which, in the opinion of some writers, may give labor a better understanding of finance.

A writer in the Analyst (New York) wonders whether the injection of organized labor interests into the realm of finance will revolutionize finance. Probably not, he thinks; "what is a good deal more probable is that the injection of organized labor into finance will revolutionize organized labor, for with the advent of a 'labor union bank' the natural course would be for the labor union directly concerned, and indirectly for all labor organizations, to acquire a greater sense of responsibility. That is what usually follows the acquisition of 'interests.' The project may bring appeasement of some of the present troubles, for, as the writer quotes, "if you want to defeat radicalism and Bolshevism and all the other 'isms' which professedly are against capital and property, put a bond in the hands of every radical. The theory in the present case "is that labor will gain a new perspective, and, through the experience acquired, come into possession of new ideas regarding banks and the things banks do. It will be a liberal education along lines in which there is now mainly ignorance, and the education ought to be highly beneficial to labor, to the banking fraternity, and to the community in general." Explaining away the "apprehension expressed in banking circles over the word 'cooperative,'" the writer says: "A national bank is not a cooperative institution. Under the National Bank Act there can be only one kind of national bank, and the word 'cooperative' is, therefore, just a fancy addition to the title, just as many other national banks have incorporated the word 'mutual' in their titles. They are not 'mutual' in the sense that that word is applied to savings banks in New York State, for example. They are national banks and nothing else, and the 'cooperative' labor bank is a national bank and susceptible to all the rules and regulations which surround all other national banks. The word 'cooperative' may be dismissed.

"Then there was, and to some extent still is, the fear that the so-called radical element in the brotherhood would force the doing of unsound acts. But against this it should be borne in mind that national banks are subject to periodic examination by the national bank examiners, who report to the Controller of the Currency, and it is the province of that official to see to it that unsound things are not done, or, if done, are checked speedily. That phase of the situation should not cause undue worry.

"In the third place, what bankers call a 'special clientele,' or a 'favored clientele,' was feared. The bank, avowedly the instrument of a labor union, with a labor union title and labor union officers running it, might possibly be expected to give too much attention to its own kind and not enough to others, with the result that the 'diversification of interests,' which experience has shown to be so vitally essential to the successful operation of all banks, would be lost, to the serious detriment of this particular institution. Of the three causes for apprehension this third appears to be the most serious.

"However, even in this respect there is the regulating law to stand in the way of too much emphasis being put upon it. The law strictly limits the amount of money which a given bank may lend to any individual or corporation. The amount of lendability is fixed with regard to the bank's capital and surplus. It is automatic. There might be expedients adopted for getting around the law, but that is doubtful. There is nothing to show that a labor bank, organized and chartered under the National Bank Act and subject to all the regulations which apply to national banks, will follow the example of the rather unhappy Non-Partisan Bank, for instance.

"With regard to the managing personnel of the new labor bank there may be some concern. The Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers has a great deal of money, estimated at anywhere from $18,000,000 to $30,000,000, and its individual members have many millions additional. That is amply sufficient to start and operate any bank. But it may be argued that there is danger in allowing inexperienced men to run the bank. There is. But does it follow that the leaders of the brotherhood, who, in times past, have demonstrated quite a little business ability and sagacity, will plunge into the business of operating their bank—which presumably is to be the custodian of their own funds and those of their organization—without first seeking expert advice and guidance?"

The Freeman, Smith & Camp Company is participating in the sale of $192,000 Cordua Irrigation District, Yuba County, California, 6 per cent. gold bonds, yielding 6¼ per cent. These bonds are tax-exempt in California and exempt from all Federal income tax. Mr. Smith says: "The bonds are selling rapidly, which goes to show that there is a good market for tax-exempt bonds at a 6 per cent. rate."

A cablegram from Commercial Attaché W. C. Huntington, Paris, under date of July 20, 1920, states that the director-general of the French customs announces a forthcoming decree removing the majority of the import restrictions on luxury goods contained in the decree of April 23, 1920. The tariff coefficients on such goods will be increased. The proposed decree contemplates increasing the coefficients on certain nonessential articles

Germany After the Armistice.

How interesting it would be to talk over the war with some real representatives of German thought, to point to indisputable facts, and to ask for the German interpretation. Such a wish was commonly expressed during the struggle, and usually by those unable to believe that the German mind was sui generis, that it worked by laws and a logic of its own and in a way bewildering and incomprehensible to the rest of the world.

But the wish to interview the German may now be gratified, at least vicariously. Lieutenant Maurice Berger of the Belgian army has done it for us. Sent on a mission to Berlin, he has conversed with statesmen, soldiers, artists, and men of letters. He reproduces their words with reportorial accuracy. Von Kluck tells him that there were no atrocities in Belgium, although franc tireurs were necessarily punished. General Bohen, who destroyed Louvain, assures him to the same effect, although he pleads a bad memory "after five years." All the soldiers are aggressive and arrogant. Germany by her virtues has excited the enmity of the world, and therefore Germany must be destroyed. Germany was pacifist and the Allies were militarist. Germany was the good man struggling against a world of wickedness.

The artists and the men of letters were no better, although not so arrogant. Max Liebermann was sure Germany had never wished for war. It was the jealous English and the revengeful French. Richard Strauss was of the same opinion, or pretended to be. Let France beware. Let her not create a new sentiment of revanche. Only from a few men like Haase and Harden did Lieutenant Berger find a different note. Haase has since been assassinated, but Harden is still brooding over the calamity that he so clearly foresaw. A few such men as these have seen the light and saw it from the start, but what are they among so many? The author leaves us with the unwelcome conviction that the German Junker is exactly where he always was, impenitent, impenetrable by fact, stupid, and incredibly arrogant. It may be that the political history of the last few years is making some headway in Germany. It must do so eventually. But it was not apparent when Lieutenant Berger made his visit and collected the material for one of the most interesting war books that has yet appeared.

GERMANY AFTER THE ARMISTICE. By Maurice Berger. New York: G. P. Putnam's Sons.

French War Books.

It is generally conceded that the war literature of France surpasses that of all other countries, not only in mass, but in range of subject and in delicacy of expression. Our knowledge of French war writings is still inadequate. We have had many of the great masterpieces, but so far we have been able to do nothing in the way of classification and arrangement.

This has now been done for us by Professor Albert Schinz of Smith College, New York. He divides French war books into those of emotional reaction, of history, or documentation, and of philosophic consideration. The first group, represented by the writings of Loti, Maeterlinck, and Verhaeren, are relatively unimportant. It is the tears in them that shine. After them came the historical and argumentative, largely made up of war novels and war diaries. Among these are the works of Benjamin and Barbusse, of Louis Thomas and of Péricard. When we come to "Philosophical Considerations" we find ourselves on much dryer ground, and one less interesting to the general reader.

Professor Schinz has done well in giving us a book that will be invaluable to those who wish for some sort of a guide to French war literature. With his aid we know exactly what to seek in accordance with individual tastes. Doubtless he will have to extend his review at some later date. Innumerable potential writers are still to be heard from, and whether we wish it or not we are likely to have an enormous diet of war books for the next hundred years.

FRENCH LITERATURE OF THE GREAT WAR. By Albert Schinz. New York: D. Appleton & Co.; $2.

The Book of Susan.

What chance is there for the daughter of a drunken mechanic and his slut of a wife, for a girl brought up in the slums of an Eastern city and with filth and vice for her early and almost only companions? The eugenist would probably say that there was no chance at all and that heredity must prove stronger than environment. But it is still lawful to hold a different opinion.

It is true that Susan is adopted at an early age by Captain Ambrose Hunt, a wealthy citizen of New Haven who has been separated from his wife. Captain Hunt has had his benevolent eye on Susan for some time, but it is not until her father has murdered her mother and then committed suicide that he is able to exercise the rights of guardianship. Susan goes to live with her benefactor and produces something like an earthquake in his sedate household. She is original, unconventional, and experienced.

And now we see the results of environment. Susan grows up into a beautiful and cultured girl with a remarkable facility in prose and verse. With unusual skill the author shows us how she transmutes the base metals of her childhood experiences, retaining their wisdom and discarding their stain. This part of the story is told with exceptional ability and fidelity, as also is the narrative of Susan's loves and the accuracy with which she discriminates between the true and the false. Captain Hunt himself falls in love with his ward in spite of the disparity of age, and although for the moment we have our qualms about this we feel that Susan can be trusted.

Unfortunately the author allows himself to include an incident that strikes a rather discordant note. Captain Hunt's wife dies, quite opportunely, as the result of an accident, and Susan is accused of her murder. She was actually a witness of the fatality, and her horror causes her to fall into a sort of trance in which she relates the actual occurrence, and to the satisfaction of the police. It is a piece of melodrama that should have been omitted. It smacks of quackery, and it is in no way improved by the author's efforts to be scientific and to exploit the subconscious. None the less, and in spite of what we must regard as a defect, the novel is a thoroughly good one, original, distinctive, and vigorous.

History of Journalism.

This is not so much a history of journalism as a sketch of journalists, with a glance at the conditions under which they worked. The author is himself a journalist, and evidently a keen student of the story of his profession. Beginning at the beginning, he tells us of the first newspaper published in America, of the journalism of the revolution and the civil war, and of Greeley and Bennett. With all that Mr. Payne says as to the loyalty and devotion that journalism has so often called forth there will be general agreement, but we may doubt if this has much redemptive effect upon journalism in general. Mr. Payne shows some caution in his general summaries of journalistic tendencies, and particularly of those of the present day, as witness his almost timorous references to Mr. Hearst. But he quotes with apparent approval the words of Mr. Godkin, who said in a letter to Charles Eliot Norton: "An immense democracy, mostly ignorant and completely secluded from foreign influences, and without any knowledge of other states of society, with great contempt for history and experience, finds itself in possession of enormous power and is eager to use it in brutal fashion against any one who comes along, without knowing how to do it, and is therefore constantly on the brink of some frightful catastrophe like that which overtook France in 1870. The spectacle of our financial condition and legislation during the last twenty years, the general silliness and credulity hegotten by the newspapers, the ferocious optimism exacted of all teachers and

The Tempering.

There was room for a novel of Appalachia and its curious people, who might have been transplanted direct from Elizabethan England and remained ever since in state of suspended animation. Mr. Buck knows the people and the place and has here turned his knowledge to good account.

A mysterious stranger comes to the Kentucky hills and settles down among the wild mountaineers. He calls himself McCalloway, and by his honesty and courage he wins the confidence of his neighbors. McCalloway attaches himself to young Boone Wellver and makes it his task to wean that young savage from the feudist traditions that have saturated his whole nature. It is a large contract. Boone is just two hundred years behind the rest of the nation, and the speed at which McCalloway urges him along the path is therefore a little breathless. It says much for the author's skill that he is able to weave such material into the fabric of a thoroughly readable novel.

THE TEMPERING. By Charles Neville Buck. New York: Doubleday, Page & Co.

The Voyage of the Sonora.

Among nearly lost arts are the fine printing and binding of books. William Morris in England produced marvels of typography, but he had no successor. Beautiful workmanship had fallen upon evil days. It had been conquered by machines.

But the highest art of the printer may still be found in San Francisco. Mr. Thomas C. Russell of 1734 Nineteenth Avenue prints books under the same inspiration that an artist paints pictures. He sets his type by hand, and it is beautiful type. The printing is faultless, and the paper a sumptuous delight to handle. Mr. Russell limits his editions to some two or three hundred numbered and signed copies, but it is hard to resist the conviction that there would be a more general demand for such exquisite books if their existence were known.

Mr. Russell's specialty is the reproduction of ancient works on the Pacific Coast, and his service is therefore a double one—to art and to history. The quality of his latest issue may perhaps best be shown by the citation of his title-page, which reads: "Voyage of the Sonora in the Second Bucareli Expedition to Explore the Northwest Coast, Survey the Port of San Francisco and Found Franciscan Missions and a Presidio and Pueblo at That Port. The Journal Kept in 1775 on the Sonora by Don Francisco Antonio Mourelle, the Second Pilot of the Fleet Constituting the Sea Division of the Expedition. Translated by The Hon. Daines Barrington, from the Original Spanish Manuscript, Reprinted Line for Line and Page for Page from Barrington's Miscellanies Published in London in 1781 with Concise Notes Showing the Voyages of the Earliest Explorers on the Coast, the Sea and Land Expeditions of Galvez and of Bucareli for Settling California for Founding Missions, and Many Other Interesting Notes as well as an Entirely New Index to both Text and Notes by Thomas C. Russell, together with a Reproduction of the Da La Bodega Spanish Carta General Showing Spanish Discoveries etc., on the Coast up to 1791 and also a Portrait of Sir Daines Barrington."

Briefer Reviews.

"Boy Scouts to the Rescue," by Charles Henry Lerrigo (Barse & Hopkins), has been published in the Boy Scout Life Series, and with the approval of the national headquarters of the Boy Scout movement. It is a capital story for youngsters.

G. P. Putnam's Sons have published "Modern French Composition for Secondary Schools and Colleges," by Philippe de la Rochelle, romance department, Columbia University. The composition covers the first year's work in French. The price is $1.35.

Maud Lindsay has already written some good books for children. Now she gives us another entitled "Bobby and the Big Road," with sixteen full-page illustrations in color by F. Liley Young. It is published by the Lothrop, Lee & Shepard Company. Price, $1.50.

Margaret Ashmun was the author of "Isabel Carleton's Year" and therefore no further recommendation is needed for "Marian Frear's Summer," just published by the Macmillan Company ($1.75). It is a really fine picture of American home life and one that all girls will enjoy.

Professor Elwood Mead has written a practical and useful book entitled "Helping Men Own Farms" (Macmillan Company; $2.25). It is a clumsy title, but none the less the book is up to date on all matters relating to government aid in land settlement, and with methods and results in California and Australia.

"The Children's Story Garden" is a collection of stories arranged by a committee of the Philadelphia Yearly Meeting of Friends. It is intended for children and it includes all sorts of stories all bound together with one new idea—that of making the Christian ideal of life interesting to children. It is published by the J. B. Lippincott Company. Price, $1.50.

Gossip of Books and Authors.

"The railroad question," says Mr. Kahn in his new book, "Our Economic and Other Problems" (Doran), "must be taken out of politics."

Helen Davenport Gibbons, author of "Paris Vistas," "A Little Gray Home in France," etc., will give several addresses at Chautauqua during July. Mrs. Gibbons accompanied her husband, Dr. Herbert Adams Gibbons, to Europe some years ago, and she will speak on "House-keeping During War-Time in France," "The American Soldier in France—A Woman's View," "An American Woman in Turkey," and kindred subjects.

Another volume in their American definitive and uniform edition of the novels of Leonard Merrick has just been brought out by E. P. Dutton & Co.—"When Love Flies Out of the Window," with an introduction by W. Robertson Nicoll.

E. P. Dutton & Co. are publishing new editions of Pierre de Coulevain's "On the Branch" and "The Heart of Life," translated by Alys Hallard.

Mr. Huebsch will add this month "A Great Inquiry," by Tolstoy, to his growing list of pamphlets. When this powerful land article greeted its first audience in the staid columns of the London Times that paper is said to have lost 4000 subscribers within a single week.

"Empress Eugénie in Exile" will probably be the title of Agnes Carey's book on the late empress, whom the author knew personally. The Century Company will publish the book immediately. Mrs. Carey's volume, it is explained, is not a formal biography of Eugénie; it is a chatty, informal book aiming to give the chief facts of her life, especially while on the throne of France, and to reveal her personality in her own words.

"A TAILOR MADE MAN."

This is a mere whiff of a play; and yet it made something of a noise in New York. The author, Harry James Smith, thought up a fairly promising idea; nothing more nor less than that a humble tailor's helper, while pressing out the handsome dress suit of a customer which had pleasing potentialities as to fit, should suddenly be obsessed with the idea of wearing it himself, and by his looks and hearing gain an entrée to the mansions of the rich. The young man, who had the American métier for the get-rich-quick scheme, had, through the good offices of some under employee in the Knickerbocker Club, gained a hack entrance to that exclusive institution and studied the members closely through a crack in a door. Thus, he explains simply, he learned how to imitate them. The author, of course, must supply some more impressive motive than a youthful desire merely to disport in dress clothes under the brilliant chandeliers of the rich. So he fakes up an ambition on the part of John Paul Bart—which is the name of the schemer, and which he always pronounces with a resplendent air, as who would say, "I belong to the Rockefeller clan"—an ambition due to a perception on his part that he has abilities above his present work and station. Those abilities, he estimates, should be brought in some way to the attention of some great financier, who will recognize them and give him employment.

The author, however, has, in carrying out his plan, holdly ridden down the looming improbabilities by hestowing a somewhat farcical tinge to his comedy. John Paul Bart carries out his scheme, holdly assumes the fine evening suit—which he carries as to the manner born—and, presenting himself at the portal of Mr. and Mrs. Newly-Millionaire, is admitted without question. True, Mr. and Mrs. N.-M. look slightly puzzled over his suave salutation, and Miss N.-M. looks at him somewhat askance. We are then permitted to view the social diversions of the rich and of their sons and daughters, which is always a lure to plain, humdrum people. You can catch the plain people any time by flashing a close view of millionaires before him, and when he can't get the real thing he will cheerfully and with innocent confidence put up with a theatrical representation of him and all his works, including home, friends, and family.

There is something about the millionaire crowd in "A Tailor Made Man" that suggests being created in the fancy of the author. One does not say to himself, "What a touch of reality!" the characters, or the majority of them, having been exaggerated to a point of, well, not exactly satire, for the observation is not keen, and the whole viewpoint is purely theatrical; but to a blend balanced between satire and farce. The character of Mrs. Kittie Dupuy, for instance, is built on lines as obvious as the moral of a Sunday-school story.

In fact, the play—or the author—has made the usual assumption of the New York public's rather childish attitude toward the drama. What goes in New York goes elsewhere, so the very obvious faults of the play do not seem to attract attention.

"On the Hiring Line," played by the Alcazar company a week or so ago, is much better, brighter, and more truly a comedy, and yet "A Tailor Made Man" made the biggest noise in New York. It must have been the millionaire flavor that did the business: the millionaire flavor plus John Paul Bart's impudence, which tickles Young America.

The play is rather weighted by the loquaciousness of that young man, who talks as much as a walking delegate. But Dudley Ayres, who looks well in evening dress and displays the proper amount of lingual nimbleness in getting off John Paul's periods, has made quite a success of the rôle, and carries his audience successfully with him even to rounding the corner of a money theft; for John Paul appropriates a fifty-dollar bill that he finds in the pocket of the horrified dress suit, under the very eyes of the innocently unconscious owner; and the audience is as gleeful over it as they were over the passing of the peripatetic bill in the peach-jam play—"The 'Traight Road.'" wasn't it? It is of course quite natural that they should laugh at what is conceived in the comedy spirit. But what is an interesting point is the frequency with which the leading character in the typical American comedy is an engaging knave, and the warm sympathy with which the average American audience takes the knave to its heart.

A cast of two dozen players was necessary to present the play, on account of the liberal manner in which the author had filled up Mrs. Newly-Millionaire's salon with speaking parts. The piece is more of a tax as a production than as a draw on the acting powers of the company, as the rôles offer few challenges to the ambitious. Mr. Ayres played the star rôle, and won his audience by the cheerful, assured effrontery of his John Paul Bart. This is Miss Inez Ragan's off week, she having enjoyed the spotlight last week in "Peg o' My Heart." Her rôle is just girl. Ben Erway seems to be developing into a character actor, and he has this week quite a disguising make-up. Mr. Hesse, specially engaged, gave a socialistically foreign flavor to the rôle of a German discontent. Emily Pinter looked too young and pretty and was too girlish in manner in the rôle of a mature climber to give the right touch to the character. Gladys Emmons carried her millionaire rôle through appropriately, and Stella Warfield invoked a hearty reality in her short scene as a stenographer. Other favorite players who appeared in the long cast are Jean Oliver, Henry Sumer, Brady Kline, Al Cunningham, and Rafael Brunetto.

THE ORPHEUM.

A capital hill this week at the Orpheum, with such lots of good timber in the performers that it is almost an all-star programme. Take Irene Franklin, for one; the lady who sang so triumphantly above her "gosh-awful" cold. This performer is one of the type that "gets over" everything that is aimed at the audience; the song, including every syllable of the words, the rhythm, the voice, the humor, the personality. She made us laugh, she made us smile—which sometimes is more of a triumph—she made us chuckle over her brief flashes of take-off, she made us want her to stay longer; and when she sang the ditty of the French "cheeken," and Frenchified look, intonation, gesture, manner, and even the sacred American slang, she was quite irresistible.

Sofly Ward and Marion Murray, assisted by Jeanne Eliot, another cute little French "cheeken," mightily amused the audience in that conjugal sparring match known as "Bahies." No doubt there is some imitation in the piece, since it is not so long since we saw another pair of marital scrappers at the Orpheum conclude to bury their differences in the seas of tenderness engendered by the care of an adopted baby, but the Ward-Murray pair went them one better by having the baby—an irresistible tot of three or four—brought on the stage, and every man, woman, and child in the audience immediately fell at the feet of the adorable chick and kissed the hem of his gingham rompers: for some one had sense enough to pick out the right kind of a child. The piece was exceptionally well played for one of its type, although it is vaudevillian to the last degree and indulges in the questionable taste of introducing jesting allusions to the starving children of Europe, and the giggle remark constituted another breach of seamliness. But the rapid skating of moods "from grave to gay, from lively to severe," just suited our vaudeville audiences, who like earnestness or a serious state of mind to be a lightning transit.

Another sketch presented by notably good performers is "Ruheville," showing a bit of life in a country-town store. The picture of the interior is well gotten up, and so are the various rural make-up of the performers, who sing, play on resounding brass, and—some, or only one of them, I guess it was—dance. But they sing sweetly and harmoniously, the quartet not allowing their voices to yell as did the brass instruments, which poured forth a clamor that almost blew us out of our seats. The 'cellist duet, however, settled down to business, and Kenneth Young and his 'cello mate played very sweetly. The star performer was the store proprietor, played by Harry B. Watson, a cute young thing masquerading very cleverly as a cute old one, who tickled the audience under its laugh-ribs with very conspicuous success.

The Jim and Marian Harkins pair are here again, Marian's business being to smile, sing, dance, and look pretty, and then to leave the stage to Jim so that he may have a long and luxurious gossip with the audience about the performance. At least that is the way we feel about it, mute though we remain, for Jim is so natural, with his simpleton look and tone, and the village-neighbor-gossip relish which he puts into the entire recital; added to which is the natural enjoyment the audience feels in listening to comments—burlesqued though they are—on what they have just been seeing.

Another good act was the "Creole Fashion Plate." That queer, daintily contoured girl with the black satin hair and the natural style in carrying her showy costumes intrigued us. We discussed her nationality. Was she Japanese? And goodness, but she had put money in her show. Look at the floral curtain, and the stage appointments, and her costumes. And see, she has a pianist all to herself. What do you think of her voice? It has a dramatic intonation, but it is slightly hollow, and very young, though she plainly is, there is a queer sound of maturity in it. At this point in my meditations she sprang her surprise, and I was humbled. But I won't tell it, so you'll be humbled, too.

Jack Wyatt with his Scotch lads and lassies is back again, his excellent act fairly crammed with color, spectacle, harmony, and song. His pipers their pipe, and his lassies they dance, the men, and indeed the whole company, have tremendously resounding voices. Jack Wyatt is a most engaging young man and drums to the queen's taste, and the Highland costumes make each man look like an athletic tower, while the girls are graceful sprites.

Francis Yates and Gus Reed have a song and patter act, one of the two—Yates, I suppose—possessing a tremendous bass voice with which he contrives to amuse; rather clever of him, as a real basso is almost too solemn for vaudeville.

The Skatelles give a splendid exhibition of dancing on skates, and Jeanette Childs, "the joy girl," demonstrates the possession of some vaudeville talent not yet fully developed. The young lady is too ambitious with her dialects, which do not "get over." Neither does her comedy, quite. Yet she has abandon, dances pretty well, and if she would cut out that hideous pink and blue rig, and, when Irene Franklin is on the stage, get out in front and study, long and soulfully, that performer's methods of "getting over," she could improve her act.

They didn't have any pictures this week: neither at the beginning or the end. One shouldn't complain after enjoying so good a hill, but I will just mildly remark that the audience is notably less responsive to the screen jokes and that we can get newspaper jokes to turn out of our daily paper, but we

Ninety Out of a Hundred

A few years ago our Service Department found that nearly half the dwellings in San Francisco had leaky water fixtures.

Ninety percent. of the leaks were in toilets.

The Service Department says that water fixtures in dwellings are now in much better condition.

But the percentage of leaky toilets remains the same.

Out of every hundred leaks inspected by the Service Department, ninety are toilet leaks.

The mechanism of a toilet gets out of order rather easily.

And the leakage which follows is not always readily detected.

Sometimes toilets leak only at nights, when the water pressure is higher than during the day.

Even in the daytime a toilet may leak badly without your knowing it.

The first intimation of the leak may come when you find yourself billed for more water than you ordinarily use.

You failed to notice that toilet leak, but the meter registered the wasted water.

Has your water bill jumped? Then there are ninety chances out of a hundred that the toilet is out of order.

Get in touch with our Service Department, so you won't be billed for water that wastes into the sewer.

GOING ON THE STAGE.

What causes some of the less gifted ones to do it? We sometimes ask ourselves in mild amazement. For those who are in the atmosphere, whose people are already in the theatrical profession, it is inevitable, and excusable even when they are but slightly dowered with talent. But what about the numerous mediocrities who disport themselves on the stage and either make you tired—although that, of course, not often: the managers see to that—or inspire you with a ruminating pity.

There is Miss A, for example; a pretty, lady-like girl who will never, never rise. Even if she had the talent she is too tall ever to play leads; or too small, or too thin, or too precise in her manner. So she is a utility woman, and, forsaking her comfortable home and her indulgent parents, she travels around the country doing theatrical drudgery and knowing it not.

Then there is Mr. B. with his frank, boyish manner, which wins the liking of his audience. Poor B, little does he know, as he dreams gorgeous dreams of future greatness, that he, too, is down for a future of dull usefulness. His boyishness will go, and by and by his dreams with them. By that time audiences, with no youthful charm to glamour their senses, will merely regard him as a useful specimen of stage furniture.

Frequently these dully useful people are put forward in some economically selected company starting on circuit because their stage experience has smoothed off a few angles, and they can sit and stand with a certain discretion. Or the penetrating voice and distinctness of speech which, added to other qualifications, induced them to try to become professional players, is instrumental in causing a stage director to cast a speculative eye on them, and temporarily to use them for a convenience and advance them. And then the resurrection of the faded dreams! Poor, poor dreamers, their paradise, a haven of bliss lighted by their name in electricity on Broadway, will never materialize. Their success, such as it is, will be of the most modest description.

And still they dream, and we forgive them their delusions and their dreams. The rewards are, or seem to be, so great. And they do not know how matter-of-factly players finally accept success. There is, of course, at first the wild elation. There is always the intense interest in the art; or nearly always. Some few tire of it, and retire early in life. But the dreamers scarcely realize how tired they get, how weary of traveling from place to place, how sick of driving plays, how bored by driving players, and how little they see of the actual life of the theatre, outside their own routine of work.

Mrs. Fiske says she practically never goes to the theatre. Evidently she knew some of the great stars by supporting them. Others, like Duse, she saw on a vacation trip; to Europe probably. On the whole, except with a few volcanic personalities, life is much of routine to all of us.

JOSEPHINE HART PHELPS.

Wit of Famous Preachers.

The witty sayings of famous men are apt to be more characteristic than their serious statements. Truth is truth, however told, but wit is a lambent flame of idiomatic personality playing around fact, or demolishing falsity. Some preachers have been witty men and some have not, but the oratorical temperament usually has a quick answer to any problem.

Luther's wit was as rough and ready as himself and his time. A scoffing spirit asked, "Where was God before heaven was created?" Luther flashed back at him, "Building hell for such idle and inquisitive spirits as you." One of his lieutenants came to him with a troublesome tale of a minister who wore a cassock while preaching. Said Luther: "He can wear three cassocks if it will help him to be a better preacher."

Quaintly solemn was the wit of Latimer when, as a court chaplain, he preached before Henry VIII. He began:

"Latimer, Latimer, take care what you say; the great King Henry VIII is here." After a pause he added: "Latimer, Latimer, take care what you say, for the King of Kings is here."

Whitefield, the father of Methodism, had that faculty of getting down to realities which has been characteristic of other preachers of that simple faith. On being asked if a certain man was a Christian, Whitefield replied:

"How should I know? I have never lived with him."

He was once visiting a brother in the church who was excessively fond of his prayers, and showed it by making rather tiresomely long ones. Whitefield arose quietly during the prayer and seated himself, and explained with serenity to his host a little later: "You prayed me into a good frame of mind, and then you prayed me out again."

Occupied with founding a new church, he had little time for theological subtleties, and once said that he expected when he reached heaven to find Charles I, Oliver Cromwell, and Archbishop Laud all singing hallelujahs together.

The reply of Dr. South to Queen Anne when she objected to the length of his sermon has passed into a religious proverb. He said:

"I would have made it shorter if I had had more time."

When Para rubber trees are tapped, after the gum has run into receptacles and stiffened, a species of large black ant is accustomed to cut out pieces of the rubber and carry them away. Bees also find use for india rubber, and some species in South America actually cut the bark of the trees that produce resinous substances in order to cause a flow of the sap. The gum is employed by the bees as a ready-made wax for their nests.

FOYER AND BOX-OFFICE.

The Curran Theatre.

The height of the summer dramatic season is reached with the coming of Jane Cowl to the Curran Theatre Monday night, August 2d. For years plays which Miss Cowl created into successes on Broadway have been coming westward without Miss Cowl's presence, but this time "Smilin' Through" has Miss Cowl, and for this reason this attraction is considered to be of special interest. And in support of Miss Cowl will be found the distinguished players who have always been identified with this noted star's companies, foremost being Orme Caldara, who has at all times been Miss Cowl's leading man since she became a star. With the Selwyns sending out the entire Broadhurst Theatre production the engagement is above the average.

Miss Cowl's play is a romance springing out of the war, with fantastic scenes dominated by the spirits of the departed.

Miss Cowl's rôle is that of a young girl whose life is in danger of being blighted through the unrelenting hatred of her uncle, and guardian for the man she wishes to marry. It all goes back fifty years to the murder of the bride of that far-off time.

Charlotte Greenwood terminates her highly prosperous four weeks' engagement tonight.

The Columbia Theatre.

G. M. Anderson's revue of revues, "The Frivolities of 1920," will play a special engagement of two weeks at the Columbia Theatre, beginning with Monday night, August 2d. With its myriads of comics, songsters, steppers, and beauties, the big show will be seen here for the first time in all the radiant splendor of the New York and Boston runs. In its numerous cast are still to be found Henry Lewis, Edward Gallagher, Joseph Rolfe, Frank Davis, Delle Darnell, Richard Bold, Tom Nip, Charles O'Brien, Dolly Best, Lelia Ricard, May Keefe, Ruth Craft, Will Goodall, the Voltaire Sisters, Edward Metcalfe, and Fay Franklin. Matinees are announced for Wednesday and Saturday.

The Alcazar Theatre.

The Alcazar players are headed by two delightful young leading people who possess ability and magnetism, more admirable qualities than mere temperament. Dudley Ayres and Inez Ragan know their business and attend to it with zeal and enthusiasm and without friction. They are a picturesque pair, the man big, graceful, well poised, and dark, contrasting with the blonde, blue-eyed beauty of the young actress, who proved a revelation in "Peg" and this week's audaciously humorous "A Tailor Made Man." These young artists, in manner and methods, grace and dignity a company of the Alcazar's splendid quality. They will be well bestowed as Jack and "Blanny" Wheeler in next week's first staging at the Alcazar of Avery Hopwood's farcical comedy, "Fair and Warmer." No funnier or more innocent farce ever made the country laugh. In the cast also are the expert farceurs Ben Erway, Emily Pinter, Brady Kline, Henry Shumer, Rafael Brunetto, and Stella Warfield.

"The Crimson Alibi," on Sunday, August 8th, is melodrama of baffling complication. It is based on Octavus Roy Cohen's story. The dramatization was made by George Broadhurst and has been holding New York audiences in the grip of suspense at his own theatre for the past six months.

The Orpheum.

Laughter will be the applause at the Orpheum this week, for a bill of almost solid comedy will make its appearance Sunday.

Frank Dobson and his Thirteen Sirens, thirteen girls selected for their beauty as well as their talents, will be the principal attraction. Frank Dobson, a comedian of attainment, will contribute more than his share of merriment. "Mrs. Wellington's Surprise," a sketch written by George Kelly for the purpose of filling the demand vaudeville makes for light comedy, is another act for which unusual merit is claimed.

Ralph C. Bevan and Beatrice Flint will have plenty of light talk and merriment-creating songs. Will Mahoney, comedian of note, will hold the stage several minutes with his monologue based on the theme, "Why be serious?"

Francis Yates and Gus Reed will prove they are jocular entertainers with their "Chinese Circus." Edna Showalter, American coloratura soprano, is destined further to establish herself in the adoration of true music lovers. "Rubeville," favorite for its delineations of rural types, and Yates and Reed with their notable turn, are scheduled for another week. Topics of the day, pictorial news, Orpheum orchestra are other pleasant ingredients of the new Orpheum bill.

VANITY FAIR.

Some little time ago there was serious trouble with the Spanish people and it was duly recorded and immortalized in these columns. No, we do not refer to the Spanish war. It was worse than that. The difficulty was first divulged in a consular report from Madrid and it related to shirts. The Spaniard, said the report, looked with deep and dark suspicion upon the American coat shirt which had just reached his markets. He disliked all innovations, and this one in particular. It suggested democracy, republicanism, and perhaps revolution. The Spaniard was accustomed to the ancient and time-honored shirt, fashioned somewhat like a tube, into which he plunged from the caudal or tail extremity and from which he convulsively emerged, disheveled but triumphant, from the cranial termination. Explanations served only to make matters worse. It was pointed out to him that the American preferred to attend to his tenuous duties while clad only in the garment known to men as the union suit, and to women, so we are informed, as combinations, or, colloquially, "combies." Now this particular procedure, this particular precedence, was prohibited by the tube or corset shirt. It was practically impossible to make the passage without disturbance of those hirsute arrangements which are the crown and the glory of the well-groomed man. If the precedence were changed and the shirt donned before the dressing of the hair, then there was a possibility of the shirt being soiled by some of those unguents that lurk in the privacy of the dressing-room and whose very existence is diplomatically ignored and even denied. It was explained to the Spaniard that the American is naturally conservative, averse to all but well-considered changes, and reluctant to inflict a slight upon the proud spirit of ancient Castille. The coat shirt was not an insidious attempt to undermine the venerable institutions of Spain. It was a reform, but not a revolution; remedial, but not iconoclastic; ameliorative, but not anarchic. Its adoption was consistent with the genius of a sensitive people, willing to set its feet upon the path of progress, but naturally and properly opposed to violence or incendiarism. By such tactful and sympathetic representations did the coat shirt establish its place in the Spanish beard, or rather on the Spanish back.

But now it seems that hostilities with Great Britain are gravely threatened, and from the same cause. It is hoped that the more serious complications may be avoided without an appeal to the league of nations to which we have not yet given our adhesion. But the situation at the moment of writing is critical. Why do we persist in throwing these bombshells into the comity of nations? Why do we act as an international firebrand, waving the bloody shirt, so to speak, in the face of those who are wedded to their deathless traditions? Why can't we be peaceful?

The Englishman has a double count against the shirt. First of all, he says, he can not put it on, and by this he means that he can not slip it over his head in the way sanctioned by usage. He buys American shirts unsuspicious of the deadly facts hidden by the artful wrappings and fastenings, and then when he tries to put them on in the way sanctified by his forefathers who came over with the Normans and extracted Magna Charta from King John at Runnymede, he is foiled by the opening down the front. So he takes them back to the shop and demands that they be sewn up. His motto is Aut Caesar, aut nullus. He will don his shirt in the time-honored way or he will go shirtless.

But there is another count in the Britisher's indictment. He objects to the arrangement of linen folds by which the back collar stud is prevented from touching the neck. Irate customers complain of the agony and despair induced by their fruitless efforts to insert the stud, and it must be said that nothing is so provocative of fury as any failure in the mechanism of the collar. One is so helpless. One customer relates his prowess with a pocket-knife in his efforts to excavate the necessary aperture. An explanation of the mystery of the double fold was fruitless. "How can I manipulate this thing," asks the agonized purchaser, "after I have my shirt on? An honest hole right through the fabric presents no difficulties. But to find the lower edge of the starched fold, to pry it up and to insert the stud is an impossibility. Not being a woman, how can I reach the back of my neck and carry out so delicate an operation without the aid of vision?" Then the shopman explained. He said that the ingenious American had faced the same problem and had solved it. It was surprising how the most formidable obstacles gave way to resolution. The American had pondered over that question, prayed over it, wrestled, and at last the light had come, as it always does. He inserted the stud before putting on the shirt. He spread the shirt on the bed, where it was relatively defenseless, and he then ruthlessly placed the stud in situ. Then he put on the shirt and everything was lovely. But the Englishman was irreconcilable. He was implacable. He was uncompromising. He said that the British Constitution could not thus be trifled with. Immemorial usage demanded that the stud be inserted after the shirt was on and he simply would not stand for a change. And as for protecting the neck against contact with the deadly stud he said he did not give a—well, never mind what he said about that. But the international situation is now strained, although it is hoped that a conference of the powers may yet avert hostilities.

A project presented to the French Senate by Louis Martin, senator from the Var, provides for radical changes in the marriage laws of France, and especially for the elimination of the pledge of obedience by a wife to her husband (says a Paris dispatch to the New York Sun and Herald). Senator Martin does not, however, intend to eliminate the provision that a husband must support his wife. His theory is that a revision of the laws governing marriage would be at least a moral satisfaction, as these laws would still contain a provision of mutual fidelity and assistance.

"The only difference would be that the husband would become a constitutional rather than an absolute monarch," he said.

The Clerical element in the Senate opposes the project. The spokesman of this element, Canon Collon, suggested that it would have no bearing on feminist problems, as if the laws were revised as proposed women would not gain anything which they do not now have. He declared that woman's influence over her husband was paramount, despite Senate-made laws.

On the other hand, protagonists of the measure cover the whole gamut of marital philosophy from that of purely religious origin, wherein sacred texts call for obedience by the wife, to that of the Socialists, who are in favor of arranging all marriage laws to meet varying economic conditions, leaving the courts to decide in individual cases whether matrimonial bonds are abrogated by a wife's disobedience.

In any event, the Senate does not know which way to turn, and ultra feminists will have to wait until October before French politicians will tackle the problem.

A new method of producing artificial daylight which, it is suggested, will revolutionize the lighting of the stage, has been invented by George Sheringham, an English artist. The apparatus is simple and consists of a high-power electric light bulb fitted with a cup-shaped opaque reflector the inside of which is painted a silver-gray color. The reflector throws the light against a screen shaped like a parasol. The screen is lined with small patches of colors, arranged according to a formula worked out by Mr. Sheringham. The light thrown down from the screen shows colors almost as well as full daylight, and much better, it is said, than any other arrangement of artificial lighting.

The day of tall buildings is about to dawn for London. "The Old Lady of Threadneedle Street," as the Bank of England is called, will be rebuilt as a structure of many stories.

Thousands of German helmets were used to repair roads in England. They were rolled out flat by road rollers, and were also used to fill up holes.

STORYETTES.

Grave and Gay, Epigrammatic and Otherwise.

At Christmas time Elinor got several little candy animals, which she has been saving because they were so cute. But one day the toy rabbit was missed. "What did you do with Bunny?" "Oh, he got too dirty to play with, so I ate him," replied Elinor.

As the powerful motor-car dashed along the French country road in a smother of dust and fumes, the owner leaned toward the chauffeur and yelled out: "Where are we now?" "Just running into Paris, sir!" roared the man at the wheel. The owner of the car shook his head irritably. "Oh, don't bother about little details," he shrieked back. "I mean what country?"

"Maria!" roared Mr. Gayboy, "where on earth is my hat?" "I am sure I do not know," retorted his wife, coldly, still showing signs of the family scene which had marked hubby's return home in the wee small hours. "You ought to," snorted the man. "I can't keep a thing about this house. It's a shame the way things disappear without any apparent reason! I would just like to know where my hat is!" "So would I," replied the lady meaningly. "You didn't have it on when you came home last night."

Charles M. Schwab at one of his Loretto dinner parties was talking about a man who was vainly beseeching the banks for a loan. "He's a rich man, too," said Mr. Schwab; "but he's work poor." "Work poor?" said a guest. "Yes, work poor," Mr. Schwab repeated. "You see, he's always got so many operations in hand that he's always short of money to finance them. Work poor, I call it." Then he smiled and added: "He's one of those fellows who dig so much that they're always in a hole."

The gob was on shore leave and happy because he had found a girl as affectionate as he. His joy was dimmed, however, for a blue-coat had forbidden spooning in the park and his girl had tabooed it in the streets. But life took on a new turn when he saw a man kiss his wife farewell in front of the Pennsylvania station, New York. He rushed his girl toward a crowd hurrying toward the Philadelphia express and bade her a fond farewell. When the crowd thinned they joined a throng for Washington and repeated the act. They repeated it again before the Chicago train. This was too much for a colored porter who had been watching. He stepped up to the gob. "Boss," he said, "why don't you go downstairs and try the Long Island station? Dem trains am a-leavin' mos' all de time?"

Mr. Gabb had been out at an all-night poker game and was trying to square himself when he got home at noon the next day. He had a package under his arm. "Wouldn't you like to know what is in this package?" asked Mr. Gabb. "I'm not a bit interested," replied Mrs. Gabb. "Well, I bought something for the one I love best in the world," announced Mr. Gabb, with a grin. "What did you buy yourself, collars or neckties?" snapped Mrs. Gabb.

He was one of those smart men who like to show their cleverness. "Watch me take a rise out of him," he said, as the tramp approached. Then he listened solemnly to the tale of hard luck. "That's the same story you told me the last time you accosted me," he said, when the vagrant had finished. "Is it?" was the answering question. "When did I tell it to you?" "Last week." "Mebbe I did, mebbe I did," admitted the tramp. "I'd almost forgotten meeting you. I was in prison all last week."

Pat was employed as a hodcarrier during the new building operations. One morning he happened to be late. Putting on his clothes in haste he hurried away without noticing that he had put on his overalls hind side to. Arriving at the works just in time, he was soon climbing the ladder with his first hod of brick, but half way up he fell to the ground. His mates rushed to the rescue. "Are you hurt?" they asked. Pat opened his eyes and for a moment gazed wonderingly at his own legs. "No, bedad," he said, "but I've had a terrible twist."

The temperance reformer was justly proud of having converted the biggest drunkard in a Scottish town and induced him—he was the local grave-digger—to get up on the platform and testify. This is how he did it: "My friends," he said, "I never thoct to stand upon this platform with the provost on one side of me and toon clerk on th' ither side of me. I never thoct to tell ye that for a whole month I've not touched a drop of anything. I've saved enough to buy me a braw oak coffin wi' brass handles and brass nails, and if I'm a teetotaller for anither month I shall be wantin' it."

Many are the stories told of the thrift of Harry Lauder. The fact that he is of Scottish descent has given humorists an opportunity to plaster a multitude of yarns, deserved and undeserved, upon his personality. Here's one: Some years ago, after Lauder had passed under the exclusive management of William Morris, he enjoyed one of the most prosperous seasons of his career. Week after week he played to capacity houses. Money flowed in the box-offices. Receptions a-many were accorded him. Publicity came from every source. Lauder was happy. "Ah, mon," he told Morris, "but it's bonnie. An' I'll not forget yet, ken that. 'Tis a rare giftie I have to make ye before I gang awa." Time and again, as the tour continued, Lauder reiterated the statement. Morris became more and more curious. He imagined all sorts of magnificent gifts, but, despite an active imagination, he could not fathom the secret. And then it came. Lauder said goodbye and walked down the gangplank of the vessel that was to carry him to Scotland. Before he left, however, he shoved a package into Morris' hand. When the vessel cleared the manager found a secluded corner and opened the package. It was a photograph of Lauder, autographed in the actor's own hand.

It was on the occasion of Mme. Modjeska's last tour through the United States. The play was "Macbeth." The city, Madison, Wisconsin, where is located the University of Wisconsin. Members of the Haresfoot Club, the college dramatic organization, imbued with a desire to see life behind the scenes, applied for work as supernumeraries. The production was late getting in and those lucky enough to be accepted were taken in charge by the "super-captain" just before the first curtain rung up. He proved to be a red-headed stage carpenter, made up and prepared to enact the rôle of the Bloody Sergeant. He gathered his little troupe about him and explained the business of the banquet scene. "It's dis way," he expounded. "De ole guy wid de alfalfa—Macbeth—he's knocked off a couple of ward bosses what stood in his way. Politics, see? He's giving a banquet to square things, and youse is his guests. He pipes a ghost, or thinks he does, after he gets full of booze, an' acts kind o' nutty. Youse gets up, all excited, but his missus—she's a wise dame—she ups and says: 'Oh, don't mind th' damn fool. He gets dat way at times.' Den youse sets down again. See? By'm'by, he goes bugs once more, and he says: 'Get t' hell out o' here.' Den you exit. Now, go on an' do your damndest." The players did.

THE MERRY MUSE.

The Vicious Circle.

This is a topsy-turvy age,
When servants ride and masters walk;
And countless jobs, with princely wage,
Go begging while the workmen talk.

The largest purse complains the most.
"Thief!" is the cry of profiteers;
False standards raise the loudest boast;
The homely virtues meet with jeers.

Confusion follows shallow thought;
The agitator waxes fat;
Expensive baubles now are sought
By all the proletariat.

Demands are granted by the score
That hint of others still to come;
When wages rise the prices soar,
And so on ad infinitum.

That this wild spree will sometime go
Is doubted not by sober men;
All vicious circles break, we know—
The only point in doubt is, When?
—Roscoe Brumbaugh in Life.

Mother Takes to Slang.

Now Mother's talking slang because Throughout the livelong day
She says she hears so much she can't Talk any other way.
She said to Dad at dinner-time,
"I'm off of you for life
Because you always gum the works
By eating with your knife!"

The preacher called at four o'clock,
And Mother started in
By being very proper, but
Ere long she saw him grin.
And was it any wonder when
She said, "What gets my goat
Is having all the hens remark,
'Tbat is ber last year's coat!'"

But most of all when sister's beau
Called on her after tea,
And I thought I would stick around,
My mother said to me:
"My son, I want to put you wise,
Your sister's in the mood
To hand you one unless you beat
It while the beating's good!"
—Harvey Peake in Judge.

"Cyrano" Isn't a Plagiarism.

When Judge Kohlsaat ruled in Chicago a few years ago that "Cyrano de Bergerac" was a plagiarism on a play by a Chicago real estate dealer, "The Merchant Prince of Cornville," the average American who had followed the case couldn't help a sense of humiliation at the exhibition of culture, or its lack, in the presence of the world. It is rare that a business man acquires the technique of the playwright and poet. Certainly the author of "The Merchant Prince" didn't have it. The contrast between Rostand's exquisite work and the amateurish and impossible Chicago product was grotesque.

If occasional similarities in plot are to count, Shakespeare would have been permanently enjoined, and the heirs of Voltaire might have held up the publication of Mark Twain's "Mysterious Stranger" on the ground that it infringed "Candide." Most of the plots have been used up. What counts in a play or in a novel is the way in which the story is handled, its insight into life and character, its style, its balance, its artistic sense.

Happily the findings of the Chicago court have now been reversed in New York, Judge Hand holding he could find "no substantial similarity between the two plays, either in form or substance."—Kansas City Star.

Mr. and Mrs. Dixwell Davenport are receiving congratulations on the birth of a son at their home in Palo Alto.

The latest thing in money-carrying devices is reported by the woodsmen who are drifting into Virginia in increasing numbers. Instead of the old scheme of carrying their stake in their woolen socks, loose in their pockets, or in a wallet, the lumberjacks and miners now carry it in their neckties. They insert the bills in the lining of the necktie, pin the tie, and then tuck it in front of their shirt. The advantage lies in the fact that one has his bank directly in front of him at all times. Incidentally, more woodsmen are wearing neckties this year than ever before.

A masterful old family, expert no less in ruling than fighting, may be complimented with the "American story," published in England, that the tactful, triumphant Mexican leader, General Obregon, is one of the O'Briens. He has blue eyes, at any rate, and reddish brown hair. To cap the felicitation, an editor points out that the last Spanish viceroy of this same Mexico was John O'Donohue, to-wit, Don Juan O'Donohu, a descendant of the O'Donohues of Munster.

CURRENT VERSE.

Song for the Senses.

Souls by loveliness are fed,
And the stars become their bread!
Hearts from sordidness are drawn
By the sunset and the dawn,
By a birch above a brook,
By a comradeship or book,
And the spirit leaps its closes,
Comprehending moons and roses,
Through the senses, which take toll
Of all the beauty for the soul!

So, though never a bard essays
Ode or lyric in their praise,
This my melody I bring
These who set my songs a-wing;
These who makes my pulses one
With the bough and bird and sun!
Yea, though hermits build defenses!
Yea, though friars flog the senses,
I shall hold them priests and be Minstrel to their ministry!

—Daniel Henderson in New York Post.

The Legions of Light.

They shall cleanse the Earth of a million sins
And a million souls set free;
Their task begins when time begins,
And ends with eternity.
Children, under the skies of blue,
Playing beside the sea
And a world refreshed and made anew
Their monument shall be.

"What do you see in the snowy clouds
Ever and ever so high,
Up by the towering City's shrouds
Where the offices mount to the sky?
All I can see is the vault of blue,
And the billowy clouds in the air,
But I know that your eyes are young and true,
Oh, tell me what you see there!"

"And what is that cloud bank far to the west,
Beyond the billows of white?
Its stormy dark and towering crest
Seems like the shadow of night.
I see the distant lightning play,
Flash and disappear,
And the thunder roars—but speak, I say,
Oh, what do you see and hear?"

"I see the Legions of Light, my friend,
In the smoke of the cannonade,
Squadrons that plunge where the ranks extend,
And the galloping charge is made;
Artillery smoke clouds whirl and change
As the battle swings along,
And I know that the gunners have found the range
And they're storming the Forces of Wrong.

"Storming the Forces of Wrong today,
And afar in the upper sky,
Above the clouds where the armies sway,
The Aerial fleets go by.
Far and far in the higher air
Of the uppermost strata of mist,
In each successive cloud-belt layer
Wherever the foe resist.

"I see the flash of the guns that speak
Across the hills of cloud,
I hear the whirr of shells that shriek
And whine and scream aloud;
The thunder and roar of heavy guns
Pounding and pounding away
Tell where the barrier river runs
And the rival armies sway.

"At first the Legions of Light fell back,
Savagely fights the foe,
Whose thundering charge and grim attack
Deal his pitiless blow.
But yet as the day wears on apace
And the sunset fires burn
On cloud and summit in starry space
I see the war-tide turn.

"For now the Legions of Light advance,
Their hosts are surging by,
Sweeping the plains and the vast expanse
Of the valley across the sky.
Their guns boom forth from crag and peak,
That tower above the plains,
And night comes on, but the guns still speak,
The Army of Light still gains."

They shall cleanse the Earth of a million sins
And a million souls set free;
Their task begins when time begins,
And ends with eternity.
Children, under the skies of blue,
Playing beside the sea
And a world refreshed and made anew
Their monument shall be.

ENVELOPES OF BAMBOO.

Some years ago American soldiers in the Philippine Islands learned a lesson from the natives that appeared in their correspondence with folks at home. Now, during the Spanish occupation every native inhabitant was compelled to carry a paper that was nominally a tax receipt, but really was a means of identification and control on the part of the Spanish.

Any native who could not at any moment produce this receipt showing that he had paid his taxes for the last or current year was subject to arrest and imprisonment, and it was very easy to deny the receipt to men whom the authorities thought they had reason to suspect.

The Filipino native rarely had a safe means of carrying papers. Any paper not well protected is likely to be devoured by ants in a very short time. And yet the man must have his tax receipt with him in order to travel from village to village or go about his business safely.

So the Filipinos devised a means of protecting their receipts. They took a slender piece of bamboo, say half or three-quarters of an inch in diameter, hollowing it out to the joint, which they left to stop one end. Then they took another piece of the same size and from the end which included another joint whittled a cover for the tube, which fitted snugly on. Then they rolled up the tax receipt, inserted it within the bamboo tube, put on the cover, and so closed it against the ants and against dampness.

The ends of the bamboo were rounded and it could be carried conveniently in a pocket in the trousers, where it was always ready to be submitted to the Spanish official.

When our soldiers arrived in the Philippines they found it much easier to get a scrap of paper of some sort on which to write a letter than to find a safe and suitable envelope. Seeing these convenient tax-receipt cases in the hands of the natives, it occurred to the soldiers that they would serve very well for envelopes, and they put them to that use—either purchasing them from the natives, using those belonging to Filipino soldiers who had been killed, or manufacturing new tubes from bamboo.

It was not necessary, as they found, to provide the bamboo tubular envelope with a whittled cover when it was used in Uncle Sam's mails. All that need be done was to put a pin through the tube at the open end. This prevented the rolled message from working loose. No ink or pasted label was necessary for this envelope. The soldier simply cut on the bamboo with his knife the name and address of the person to whom the letter was sent.

The selection by the Bahai convention of a design for a great Maharak Klazkar, or place of worship, to be erected in Chicago, reveals what is said to be one of the most original ideas in architecture since the thirteenth century. The temple model selected was constructed by Louis Bourgeois of New York. It is of terra cotta and has been pronounced by experts to be unique in its beauty and appeal. It has nine sides topped by a transparent dome. The new temple will be a place of universal worship, as the Bahai movement is based on the principle of the brotherhood of man. The nine doors of the temple never will be closed.

MOTOR OILS

ANNOUNCEMENT

We beg to announce that the Associated Oil Company is now developing and will soon put upon the market a full line of new high grade motor lubricating oils made from selected California Crude Petroleum. This Company has completed extensive laboratories furnished with the most modern and complete equipment for Petroleum Research. In addition to the usual physical and chemical laboratories, a special Motor-Oil Testing Laboratory has been provided (first on the Pacific Coast) for testing Associated motor oils under actual service conditions in internal combustion engines before their final approval for sale. This Motor-Oil Testing Laboratory is, therefore, both a check on manufacturing methods and the best guarantee of uniformly good quality and greatest serviceability to the user.

As It Works Out.

It will be remembered that when it was proposed at the Paris Conference to create a "general staff"—otherwise an organization for military authority and direction—the American delegation objected and the proposal was put to one side. Now, under date of August 3d, comes a report from San Sebastian to the effect that "a motion for an international general staff as part of the league of nations has been adopted." The significance is plain. The council of the league of nations proposes to set up a military organization, and the logic of this movement looks to drawing from the several countries component of the league military and naval forces to operate, not by national authority and direction, but under authority of the league. France, through her representative, M. Léon Bourgeois, is the proponent of this project, which is in logical accord with the French notion as to what the league should be. In the conference the chief anxiety of the French representatives was for an organization of international forces that would serve as a guarantee against any movement upon France on the part of Germany or any other country. This newest development affords a fresh and emphatic argument against entrance into the league of nations on our part without reserving to our own country the right of determining its military policy in respect of international contentions. If as President Wilson insists—and Candidate Cox now proposes—we should enter the league without reservations, and so make ourselves subject to its judgments and requirements, we should under this latest development be committed to support of its (the league's) military projects. This would imply contribution of forces military and naval to armaments not subject to direction by our own government but bound to action under orders from the league. It goes without saying that the American people would never consent to such use of its military and naval powers; and since participation upon such terms is impossible the logic of the situation enforces the necessity for reservations giving full protection of our rights of action subject to direct authorization from Washington.

Cantu Defies Huerta.

Esteban Cantu, a young high-caste Mexican of military training, came to the government of Lower California—a Mexican territory, as distinct from a state—several years ago through appointment by one of the revolutionary administrations that have successively ruled his tortured country. He has held his place through several revolutionary periods not so much by executive favor as by his own hardihood and a notable capacity for organization and administration. The conditions have favored him greatly, since Lower California is practically cut off from continental Mexico by a wide strait, and is bounded on the north by the American state of California, which forms an absolute barrier to the approach of a continental army. Lower California as related to continental Mexico is practically an island, to which the various revolutionary authorities have not had access through their lack of navy or of resources of transport.

Thus detached and thus protected, Cantu has ruled in his little world as a dictator and, as a Mexican and as a military man, has made his authority count after the traditional standards of dictatorship. Disregarding and defying successive Mexican "presidents," he has been practically independent of other authority than that of his own sweet will. He has imposed heavy taxes, especially upon alien land owners—for the most part citizens of California. By arbitrary methods he has contrived to bring into his treasury a relatively large revenue. What part of his exactions have been placed to his private account in American banks nobody knows, but common judgment of those in a position to know something of his affairs is that he has safely placed a large private fortune. Concurrently he has spent considerable sums in local development. He has built roads, established telegraphic and telephonic services, built some rather showy schoolhouses, and in various other ways illustrated a spirit both progressive and liberal as compared with ordinary Mexican standards. At the same time he has taken care to maintain his own fences in a military sense. His little army of a thousand or more men, admirably equipped, officered, and supplied, is a model of military organization. A group of San Francisco gentlemen who visited him some months ago were surprised to find at his headquarters, not a mob of ragamuffins, but a regiment of well-set-up soldiers, including a military band that rendered "The Star-Spangled Banner" in a manner that quickened their pulses. Manifestly Governor Cantu is a disciplinarian as well as an administrator.

It goes without saying that Governor Cantu is not more legitimately in authority in Lower California than any other man. He is and has been for several years simply and without apology a dictator, holding authority by the power of his little army. But as Mexican governments go, his rule has been better than that of many another. And while he has no legal or moral rights, it ill becomes anybody at the City of Mexico to dispute his authority on legal or moral grounds. His right has been that of possession and of force to hold his place against all comers. Now comes the new régime established in the City of Mexico with a demand upon Cantu to step down and out and to turn over the governorship to a new man commissioned by the Huerta government. Cantu sees no reason why he should yield his place because somebody else wants it. His title is quite as good as that of the so-called President of Mexico. In truth he holds his place by virtue of a tenure much more extended in point of time and on the whole more definitely established. He has, according to news reports, determined not to yield and is recruiting his forces with the idea of resisting armed invasion representative of President Huerta. There is much in the situation tending to his advantage. He has now an army of some four thousand men—as fine an ensemble of cut-throats as could be found this side of hell-fire—and he has stores of arms, ammunition, and food ample for an extended siege. He proposes to meet the invaders at strategic points and he is confident that he can overcome any force that Huerta, under the limitations of his transport, may be able to send against him. Thus the matter stands.

There are strong forces in support of Cantu's position. Of course there is no such thing as public sentiment, since the native population of Lower California is low in the scale of intelligence, subject wholly to authority based upon force. But all the resources of the country are in Cantu's hands; and in addition he has the financial backing of alien elements of various kinds established in the country. There is a considerable number of Americans, Chinese, and Japanese, naturally the most intelligent and energetic element in the territory, and all these, so it is said, will support Cantu. They are prosperous under conditions as they are and do not want a change almost certain to be accompanied by new and onerous exactions. Cantu's demands have at times been grievous, but alien calculations are based upon the old adage of the frying-pan and the fire. They prefer to endure the ills they have than to take on others that they know not of.

In connection with this situation there are rumors to the effect that Cantu's ambitions have grown under the stimulation of local success and that he aspires to the "presidency" of Mexico. It would be difficult to find a reason why his claim to this doubtful dignity is not as good as that of Huerta or anybody else. The presidency of Mexico is for him who can grasp and hold it, and Cantu assuredly has exhibited an organizing power and a hardihood equal to that of anybody who has appeared anywhere upon the Mexican stage since Diaz. He is still a young man—on the sunny side of forty—and he has beyond question the virtue of courage allied to skill and experience. He is a demonstrated leader and commander. He is well established in a situation having many strategic advantages and in his disciplined little army he has the nucleus of a definite power. We can think of no reason that should bar Cantu from an ambition to hold his place or to extend his autocratic authority, save that of the common sense which would dictate a policy of letting well enough alone. By the simple expedient of jumping across the irrigation ditch that separates Mexicala from Calexico he could find refuge in the United States, where it is presumed his balances in bank are ample for any career he might choose. Probably he will not do this, since it is not in the character of a Mexican furioso to seek security and repose when there lies before him the chance of a stormy career.

Through his wife's family Cantu has a local connection with San Francisco; and through long-extended relationships with Californian owners of lands in the territory which he has long ruled, he has many affiliations and friendships here. It is therefore natural that local sympathy should be with him, even though many from time to time have resented his exactions. He bold and on the whole an engaging figure, and as against enemies certainly no better than himself the Argonaut wishes him luck.

A Deadlock at Washington.

For the first time during the Wilson régime a congressional committee—the Senate Committee on Commerce—holds and is prepared to use a club over the President. It is in connection with reorganization of the Shipping Board, which under the new merchant marine law may easily become the most powerful independent arm of the government. Its powers for good or evil are tremendous, being equal to if not in excess of the powers of the Interstate Commerce Commission. The future of our sea-carrying trade, upon which such great hopes are placed, lies in the hands of this board. Its members will receive the same salaries as cabinet ministers and their prestige will be little less than that of members of the cabinet. In fact one cabinet officer, Mr. Alexander, now Secretary of Commerce, is anxious to give up his present post for an assignment to the Shipping Board.

The Jones Act, under which the Shipping Board is to function, is rigid in its insistence upon expert as distinct from political qualifications in the board members. It is an assurance that the Senate Commerce Committee, to which board appointments will be referred, will either pigeon-hole or report adversely any appointment the President may make unless there is assurance of eminent practical qualifications in the appointee. Senator Jones, the author of the bill and chairman of the Commerce Committee, will see to that. He regards the Shipping Board and all that relates to it with the jealousy of parenthood. He is eager to see the administration of the act placed in competent and sympathetic hands; and he has declared in a semi-public way that no appointee who does not fill the requirements shall get past the committee.

The old Shipping Board had five members; the new board is to consist of seven. Of the old board only two, Admiral Benson, the chairman, and Captain Donald of New York remain, all the others having resigned. The Senate refused to confirm President Wilson's appointment of Martin Gillen of Wisconsin, so that assignment has lapsed. It is within the power of the President to give Gillen a recess appointment that would hold until the next adjournment of Congress, but he has thus far refrained and is not expected to act further in Gillen's behalf.

In the meantime there is real necessity for organizing the board under the Jones Act and setting it to the huge work provided for it. Yet the President does not act, obviously being fearful that any appointment he may make under the practice of selecting men for political reasons will be rejected. For besides the wish to secure qualified men there is on the part of the Senate the partisan motive of throwing over important appointments until Mr. Wilson shall have left the White House. This motive, which is not an unnatural though not a very worthy one, has its influence in relation to all executive appointments at this time. A Republican Senate is very much in the mood to refuse confirmation of any appointment for a term of office that will run far into the forthcoming administration.

Of course it is within the power of the President to "get by" senatorial opposition by naming for membership of Shipping Board men of notable qualification. But this alternative is not to his liking. He has a long waiting list of "deserving Democrats," and if he can not draw from this list he is not likely to make any appointments.

Back-Pedaling.

Late news from Washington is to the effect that President Wilson has "released" Candidate Cox from strict observance of his (Cox's) acceptance of the Administration attitude on the league of nations. It was high time to cut the cards. The bargain under which Cox accepted dictation from Mr. Wilson on this particular issue in return for Administration support was a tactical blunder as well as a moral concession, and the fact quickly became apparent. What good is it, asked those who brought about Cox's nomination, to defeat Wilson in the convention and then to permit him to define the conditions of the campaign? Where is the advantage in putting over the nominee if Mr. Wilson is to write his platform?

But it was not alone the "practical" group by which Cox's nomination was brought about who took offense at the bargain under which the nominee was to swallow the Wilsonian programme body, boots, and breeches. Democrats the country over who had appraised the Cox nomination as a break-away from autocratic domination at the hands of a stubborn egotist profoundly resented an attitude on the part of the candidate indicative of weakness. Nobody wants in the presidency any man's man, and particularly distasteful was subserviency on the part of Cox, who had been accepted as a man of independent mind. Back-pedaling is never a graceful performance, but it has become necessary in the immediate instance if Mr. Cox would retain the allegiance of his own party and the respect of the country at large. There is that in the whole deal that is mighty unpleasant. It has tended to disturb faith in Mr. Cox as a man who does his own thinking and who stands consistently and courageously for his own judgments and purposes.

But the issue of the league of nations is not Mr. Cox's only embarrassment. He is not exhibited in an edifying light in the attempt to back-pedal in the matter of prohibition. In times past, and especially in his gubernatorial campaign, Mr. Cox has been a moderate "wet." He has stood upon the high ground where most men of sense stand, namely, for individual liberty. He was nominated at San Francisco by forces radically "wet." The effort now making in his behalf to placate "dry" sentiment smacks too distinctly of campaign diplomacy. Mr. Cox would better stand where he has stood all along than to seek by adroit phrases to win favor from the radical element.

Unless Mr. Cox goes back on his declared principles, unless he goes back on his record, unless he goes back on his "practical" friends and sponsors, he will be as he has been in the past a moderate "wet." He would better let it go at that. No man gains anything, even in politics, by gulping his principles and assuming a pose at odds with his views and judgments. The notable and notably successful men in the political life of the country have not been compromisers or dodgers.

The Senatorial Primary.

A Washington correspondent writing in the New York Sun represents the capital city—by which he means Republican members of Senate and House—as "enthusiastic" over the prospect "that Harding will repair Wilson's mistakes." Further, that he "will bring the government back to a constitutional basis." It is truly a cheering prospect, but it can be transmuted into reality only by concurrent action on the part of the executive and legislative branches of the government. If we shall elect a Republican President and at the same time give over control of either the Senate or House to Democratic authority we shall have, as we have had during the past two years, our house of government divided against itself. Every man of practical political observation knows precisely what this means. It means nothing less grievous than a period of contention with paralysis where there ought to be cheerful and wholesome coöperation.

All omens point to the election of Mr. Harding, also to the choice of a controlling majority of Republicans in the House of Representatives. Of the situation as to the Senate there is less promise. If the country were this year to elect a full Senate there would be practical assurance of a Republican majority. But only one-third of the Senate—thirty-two members—are to be chosen this year; and of this number the Democratic party will surely have nearly half, if not indeed fully half. The only way in which the Republican party can hope to control the Senate during the coming two years is through winning seats now held by Democrats. Several states normally Republican, like our own, are now represented in the Senate by Democrats; and the hope of Republican control lies in winning back senatorships lost in recent times to personal popularity, through party dissensions, or through other untoward causes. The situation should emphasize, especially to Republicans in states where they may possibly be successful, the necessity for united and discreet action. No personal or petty consideration should be permitted to nullify the power that abides in normal majorities and so possibly result in a distressing situation at the seat of government.

It is a primary obligation, especially in doubtful states, not only to elect senators nominally Republican, but men dependably Republican. This brings us again to consideration of the situation as it stands in California. There are here three primary candidates for senatorial nomination to compete for election in November with Senator Phelan, a Democrat. Of the three, Mr. Wallace is a chaser of rainbows, an amiable faddist of no fixed political character, a man of questionable and unstable affiliations. Another, Mr. Kent, is a chronic malcontent, a man of eccentric habits of thought and action, quite as likely in emergencies to fly the track as to hold a consistent and steady course. Of the three the only man of dependable party loyalty is Mr. Shortridge. It becomes therefore a matter of supreme importance, if California is to be represented in the Senate by a man of assured loyalty to Republicanism and to a Republican President, that Mr. Shortridge should win nomination in the coming primary election. It is a time when Republicans of California should put to one side all considerations of a personal and trivial nature and concentrate their votes upon the one candidate who may definitely be relied upon to sustain party policies in coöperation with a Republican President.

The Argonaut purposely refrains from considering any issue of personality in this contest. It concedes the respectability of Mr. Wallace and Mr. Kent. It is sufficient to say that, measured by all the elements of character and capability, Mr. Shortridge is fully the equal of either of his competitors in the primary. The main consideration—the consideration that dwarfs all others—is that of dependable party loyalty, and at this point Mr. Shortridge is plainly the man in whose support Republicans should unite.

The election of Mr. Harding would be shorn of much of its significance if the country shall fail to elect a Senate of coöperative mind and spirit. The misconceptions and the mistakes of the Wilson régime will have to be endured for at least two years to come if in placing Mr. Harding in the White House we fail to establish a Republican majority in the Senate.

Editorial Notes.

Secretary Baker has approved the action of the Contract Adjustment Board allowing John A. Wilson of Oil City, Pennsylvania, $70,000 for work performed by him during the war in developing a stabilizer for airplanes. Mr. Wilson—a first cousin of the President—demanded $250,000 for his labors, but will accept the award of the board in full settlement. Many similar claims for work done in the development of war machinery are still pending, and it will probably be many years before we shall know what the government must pay for guns that never fired a shot at the enemy and airplanes that never got into action.

The bargain under which "General" Villa abandons outlawry for a post of "authority" in the Mexican government does not tend to the dignity or illustrate the solidity of the Huerta régime. Strong governments do not buy off those who rebel against them. A strong "president" would have pursued and crushed Villa. And of course it is idle to suppose that a creature of the Villa type can under any sort of deal count as a factor in a legitimate and orderly system. Furthermore, what is the Washington government going to do about it? Villa, now in the way of becoming "an important factor" in the Mexican government, is the same Villa who a few years back raided the American town of Columbus and murdered many of the inhabitants. He is the same Villa who in cold blood has murdered scores of Americans in Mexico, present there under treaty guarantees. Likewise he is the same Villa notoriously guilty of unnumbered outrages of inhuman type. Our President declined any kind of recognition of old General Huerta, dethroned and drove him to his grave on the presumption that he was a murderer. Now it will be interesting to see what stand he will take under the new order of Mexican organization.

A Man of Affairs on Present-Day Problems.

Mr. Otto Kahn, the well-known financier of New York, has put into a book—"Our Economic and Other Problems"—the reflections of a lifetime spent in active and successful business. Mr. Kahn deals with present-day conditions and applies to them a wealth of practical wisdom. Herewith a few excerpts:

The railroad question must be taken out of politics. When the government undertakes business the result usually is that it does indeed become an "undertaker."

The Interstate Commerce Commission has greater power and greater responsibilities concerning the industrial life of the nation than is exercised by probably any other tribunal anywhere in the world.

The Interstate Commerce Commission, being at the same time prosecutor, judge, and jury, combining in itself legislative, executive, and judiciary functions, may assuredly have earned a negation of the root principle from which the American system of government springs.

The two things, i. e., private management and permanent government guarantee of earnings, are simply not reconcilable. The railroads can not eat their cake and have it. You can not rent your house to some one and then expect to be master in your house.

Scientific rate-making is an impossibility.

Why unnecessarily hid up the price against ourselves by extending the scope of governmental activities beyond the field which naturally belongs to them?

Wrong economics, however well-intentioned, have been more fruitful of harm to the people than almost any other single act of government.

Enterprise is hampered by the taxation now in force and thereby production retarded.

The excess profit tax and, by reason of the kind and manner of its graduation, the income tax, instead of promoting restraint of expenditures, are rather breeders of extravagance.

It lays a heavy and clumsy hand on successful business activity. It is grossly inequitable in its effects. It puts a fine on energy, enterprise, and efficiency. It is bound to operate unfairly, freakishly, and unevenly, and greatly enhance the cost of things.

A small committee of well-informed men of different callings, approaching their task free from political, social, and sectional bias, would not find it a formidable undertaking to evolve a measure which while fully responsive to the dictates of equity and social justice, would produce no less revenue than the taxation now in force, and yet would be far less burdensome upon the country, less hampering to enterprise and less productive of economic disturbance and dislocation.

The primary cause of poverty is underproduction. Furthermore, lessened production naturally makes for high costs. High wages accompanied by proportionately high cost of the essentials of living don't do the worker any good. And they do the rest of the community a great deal of harm.

If through undue exactions, through unfair use of his power, through inadequate output the workman brings about a condition in which the pressure of high prices becomes intolerable to the middle classes, he will create a class animosity against himself which is bound to be of infinite harm to his legitimate aspirations. Precisely the same, of course, holds true of capital.

Liberty means neither uniformity nor the rule of mediocrity. It is not material success which should be abolished; it is poverty and justified discontent which should be abolished.

The possession of wealth does not make a man a financier any more than the possession of a chest of tools makes a man a carpenter.

Finance means constructive work. It means mobilizing and organizing the wealth of the country into a mighty current of fruitful coöperation.

Short selling has a legitimate place in the scheme of things economic.

Short sells are born, not made. But if there were not people born who sell short, they would almost have to be invented.

Nothing that we fought for makes it incumbent upon us to entangle ourselves in the age-long racial squabbles and intrigues of Europe and Asia, or to become the guardians and guarantors of an arbitrarily and artificially remodeled world, put together in disregard, more or less, of the evolution of centuries and of the proven qualities and characteristics of races, according to the perceptions, predilections, and compromises of a few men assembled in secret conclave.

Reserved Powers of the States.

How the Federal Constitution is Being Overthrown by Executive and Courts.

BERKELEY, CAL., July 29, 1920.

TO THE EDITOR—Sir: The people can not understand too clearly how their Eighteenth (or prohibition) Amendment to the Federal Constitution was overthrown by the United States Supreme Court by judicial interpretation, and a spurious provision substituted which never was submitted to a single state legislature.

This amendment, as legally established by the representatives of the people, was not as radical as is commonly supposed. It prohibited the manufacture, sale, and transportation of intoxicating liquors, and declared that Congress and the several states should have concurrent power to enforce the prohibition.

The states were restricted to prohibition. But in that field no new powers were granted to states. Their original powers were specifically confirmed by the declaration of concurrent power. But the Federal government derived all of its prohibition powers solely from the grant and could not legally exceed its terms. Proper interpretation therefore required that the state powers, being original, should be interpreted liberally and the national powers strictly; in conformity with the Tenth Amendment, which declared that all powers, not granted to the general government or prohibited to states, were reserved to states or to the people. The amendment enables concurrent power to be exercised without conflict; by the Federal government in the great field of extra-state commerce, and by each state within its own area.

Thus the Eighteenth Amendment recognized the wisdom of confirming the municipal police powers of states in control of liquor traffic within their areas; on the theory that a republic can be developed soundly only by placing on the people and local communities and states the duty of solving the problems of health and of morals, and not by abandoning these duties. The great advance which has been made in this direction during the short life of our own nation demonstrates the wisdom of this theory; and the dehauchment of morals and contempt for law which has been produced by the methods and the example of the Federal government discloses the unsoundness of that policy.

But the Supreme Court declined to limit the nation to the field of extra-state commerce. It declared that congressional laws should be supreme over state laws. It canceled the legal grant of concurrent powers and substituted: "Congress shall have paramount power to enforce this amendment and the states shall exercise only, such powers as are not in conflict therewith."

This counterfeit amendment is the warrant for that horde of sneaking Federal agents that are spying upon the habits of every individual; for search, for seizure, for arrest, for fines, for imprisonment, and for holding the Federal troops in reserve to enforce this tyranny.

But while the Supreme Court declared its purpose to enforce prohibition, regardless of the grant of power; its inspiring motive lay deeper and begins with our national history.

Under the Articles of Confederation, our first Constitution, the original states declared that our national organization was a compact between states; and as there was no higher power to decide, each state had perfect right to interpret the national Constitution to suit itself. Therefore the nation became a failure.

To cure this defect the present national Constitution was adopted. It established the Federal Supreme Court, which, under the able leadership of Chief Justice Marshall, stripped the states of the power of self-determination and transferred this power unqualified to the national government. Thus the new government was as unbalanced as the old.

The inevitable result has been subversion of constitutional government, and steady usurpation by the nation of the rights, the liberties, and the powers of the states and of the people. The Federal government has become to a dangerous extent a lawless despotism. The national Constitution is laughed at in the halls of Congress. It is ignored by the President. It is misinterpreted by the United States Supreme Court.

On declaration of independence from England the original states became independent nations, except as to the limited powers that were granted to the Federal government. The state powers were the same as those of England. They owned their public domain, consisting of submerged and of high lands; they controlled their waters, navigable and unnavigable. This national power is the true source of the claim of Western states to exclusive control of their waters.

The Federal government solicited and obtained control of the continental public domain as a trust fund for erection of new and equal states, with jurisdiction, with sovereignty, with taxing power, with eminent domain, with municipal authority running over their entire legal areas. It immediately converted this trust and raised the fiction of ownership. Standing solely upon this fraud, the Federal courts have enforced multitudes of orders and decrees, civil and criminal, without the slightest effort to show legal jurisdiction, and they can show none.

The nation has used its control of extra-state commerce to usurp the municipal police powers of states. The notorious Mann law is an example. It was quickly sustained by those courts and is eagerly enforced and has made those courts promoters of blackmail.

We have become familiar with intimations from Federal benches that those courts are conservators of public morals. The only police powers that properly inhere in those courts, except as constitutionally specified, are such as protect the legitimate functions of that government.

The Federal government solicited a treaty with Canada to obtain control of migratory birds. Its courts are fining and imprisoning citizens for shooting ducks which are hatched within the United States and which never have been outside its borders. Over such birds neither the treaty nor those courts have the slightest jurisdiction. Jurisdiction lies solely in state officials and state courts.

Led by the Federal government, multitudes of zealous people are eager to overthrow our constitutional structure on the chance of obtaining some end which they have immediately in view.

One of our gravest problems is to devise a balanced constitutional structure, which will give an efficient nation and at the same time preserve the rights and the liberties of the states and of the people. A practical solution seems to be reorganization of the United States Supreme Court by incorporating a strong minority of state judges going in constant succession to serve for a limited period on our highest bench and then returning to their state duties; the Federal government having not the slightest control over them.

GEORGE EDWARDS.

New York State will lead the nation in intensive application of forestry to idle lands, under plans now being formulated in Otsego County. This country, whose hills and valleys, lakes and streams formed the setting for Cooper's Leatherstocking tales, is organizing a system of county and township forests, on the basis of a survey by the New York State College of Forestry at Syracuse. The plan is for each township to plant a forest of roughly 100 acres as a starting point. The several forests will be part of the county system and will be connected with the highways to make them accessible from all parts of the county.

The standard of value in Potosi, Bolivia, for everything from sweethearts to cities is the Silver Hill of the Thunderer. Willis Knapp Jones in the August Travel gives a picturesque history of the wonderful Bolivian silver mine and the town which spent ten million dollars celebrating the coronation of King Philip II of Spain. As the legend goes, when the early Indians started digging there for silver the mountain shook and thundered, "This hill is not for you. It belongs to a race which will come later." In this strange town silver was more plentiful than bread.

"Wireless telegraph is new; wireless communication is as old as biblical times." With this statement the National Geographical Society at Washington quotes from a communication by John A. Kingman, who sets forth the interesting theory that the island of Capri was an imperial wireless station of ancient Rome. "We know that the ancients signaled in various ways and over long distances," he says. "They signaled by beacon fires, by beacon smoke, by pigeons, by flags, and by shouting from one sentinel to another."

United States mail for the Orient is to be carried by the Empress steamers of the Canadian Pacific ocean services if the Dominion government approves the contract just concluded by the steamship line and the American postal authorities. A feature of the proposed arrangement is the transportation of American mail from Seattle to Victoria by airplane.

RUSSIA AND ASIA.

The historian Buckle says somewhere that European civilization was born in Belgium and that it is likely to die in the Balkans, a summary not without its significance when we remember that the war began in Belgium and that its fires are still burning fiercely along the whole length of the old eastern front. Tacitus, too, said something of the same sort a thousand years earlier. He pointed out that the Balkan area had always been the scene of fierce fighting for its narrow gangway between Asia and Europe. The hostile hordes sought the valley of the Danube because the great river gave them water and transportation. If Tacitus could have foreseen the present evolution of Europe and the aspirations of Asia he would have looked forebodingly toward the future of that same gangway uniting the two continents, he would have predicted a continuation of the bloody struggle that even then was age old. It is before our eyes today. Behind all the wretched little quarrels for areas, for mandates and for dominions, the colossal forces of two continents are preparing for a struggle greater than any that we have yet seen.

It is by their bearing upon continental rather than national issues that we must judge the many wars that are now being waged. Russia occupies the centre of the stage in all of them. Great Britain cares nothing about the Balkan States, nor about Turkey, nor about Asia Minor, except in so far as they may be defensive fortresses upon the road to India. The defense of India was the ostensible cause of her traditional history toward Russia. Here we have the explanation of the Crimean war, and of the success with which Turkey maintained her position as a European power. So long as Turkey was allowed to be the keeper of the gate at Constantinople, so long was India safe from Russia. But now comes the war, and a completely new arrangement of national values. The gunfire dies away at Verdun and the Somme and the Argonne, and Europe wakes up to the fact that, after all, she has been fighting for the Balkan Peninsula and for Asia Minor. She has, not yet aroused herself to another fact, that she is no longer dealing with an Asia that is supine and abject, but rather with an Asia that is alert and indignant. But that realization will come in due time. Meanwhile her greedy little statesmen run to and fro with their measuring rods and chains, like land surveyors on a new homestead, blind alike to the real issues and to the handwriting on the wall.

The new arrangement of national values is so evident that it needs no indication. Russia has renounced her old territorial ambitions, but their place has been taken with what we may call idealistic ambitions. She is resolved to impose Bolshevism upon the world, and she is moving westward and southward to that end. Now Russia is far more Asiatic than European, and here we have a fact that we are prone to forget. For five hundred years Russia has been boycotted and ostracized by Europe. She has been insulted, baffled, and thwarted, and for no other original reason than her early choice of the Greek orthodox rather than the Roman communion. Russia has been insistently invited to consider herself as Asiatic and to turn her face eastward rather than westward. Her old appeal for the cultural aid of the West was answered only by the Germans, who were quick to supply her with statesmen, soldiers, farmers, and teachers. Russia thus became German and Asiatic, a blend that showed itself disastrously during the war in the form of a governmental pro-Germanism, and that will show itself more disastrously still when Russia is called upon to take sides between Europe and Asia. Thus Nemesis moves unswervingly upon her appointed paths. All that Russia is today she was compelled to be by the unreasonable rancors of Europe.

In the meantime Europe is opportunist, and a glance at the present wars will show the extent that this is the case. Europe thinks of nothing but the apparent advantage of the moment. She is busy staking out her little claims, oblivious of the fact that all of them are below high-water mark.

Two weeks ago it seemed inevitable that the Bolshevik armies would overrun Poland and would reach the German frontier, and it was so stated in this column. Some kindly critics believed that an undue pessimism had been displayed, and they pointed to the armistice proposals and to what they believed to indicate a Bolshevik moderation in the hour of victory. None the less events continued to march. First we were informed that the Bolshevik armies would persist in their progress undeterred by the armistice and it seemed that this was what they were actually doing, and it is what they are now doing. Then we were informed on August 1st that Bolshevik cavalry had reached the East Prussian frontier. They had not crossed the line between Suwalki and Grodno, and therefore they were not actually on German soil, but they were fraternizing with the German troops. On the same day, or the day before, we had an appeal from General von Ludendorff to the effect that the Bolsheviks were about to invade Germany and Germany was not allowed to raise the forces necessary to her defense. Von Ludendorff evidently spoke the truth, seeing that his warning was confirmed by the bulletin announcing the arrival of Bolshevik troops on the German frontier and their fraternization with the German troops. And now at the moment of writing on Wednesday comes the news that the armistice negotiations between Russia and Poland have failed and that the Russians will continue their advance, which they would have done in any case. The prevision of a Russian advance upon Germany has thus been justified. France, England, and Poland were unable to prevent it, just as they would be unable to stop the tides of the ocean. And Germany herself was not allowed to prevent it. Great Britain and France are now sending munitions to Poland, and probably the Bolsheviks will get them all. They can not send armies because the armies would refuse to go. It may be said that Great Britain is rather reluctant to help the Poles because she wants a resumption of trade with Russia beyond everything else. France is eagerly on the side of the Poles because she hopes thereby to compel Russia to pay her debts. No one cares anything at all about the Poles. That was shown clearly enough at the peace conference.

The Turkish situation shows a similar difference of opinion between Great Britain and France, as well as a similar blindness to the coming storm. The question is, What shall be done with the Turk, and how shall it be done in such a way as to avoid the religious frenzies of the Mohammedan world? France is willing to let the Turk alone, and this means that France is reluctant to begin another war in the east for a return that she would regard as wholly inadequate. Great Britain would like to turn the Turk out of Europe and out of a good deal of Asia Minor, as this would remove what is now a threat against the Bagdad Railroad and the road to India. But Great Britain also is unwilling to begin a new war against the Turks because she is afraid further to arouse Mohammedan animosities in India, already at a fever point. But perhaps Greece, now in occupation of Smyrna, might be persuaded to attack the Turkish armies by a promise of further rewards at the cost of Turkey. As a matter of fact the Greek army is now advancing from Smyrna and from the Sea of Marmora. Greece is acting in the interests of Great Britain and for the protection of the road to India. Asia Minor is still the political centre of the human race, the birthplace of all wars as of all religions.

Now it is evident that Russia and Turkish interests lie along the same line. France and Great Britain are fighting Russia and they are also fighting Turkey, at least in intent. Bolshevik armies are moving southward into Turkish territory and there is certainly no resistance on the part of the Turks. Russian forces are already in Armenia, and are thus actually threatening the Bagdad Railroad to the Persian Gulf and India. No wonder Great Britain is uneasy as she finds herself impelled to make a choice between the smashing of the Turkish armies, which involves dangerous resentments in India, or peace with Turkey, which would still further facilitate the advance of Bolshevik influence in the same direction. And now comes a bulletin from London dated July 31st to the effect that General Skobeloff's plans for the invasion of India are being studied by the Russian leaders with a view to the conquest of that country, and that the Bolshevik propaganda, already rife in India, is intended as a preliminary to something more forcible. Have we not then some cause to recognize that Russia is acting as an Asiatic power and that Asia in general is looking upon her as a friend? Russia is overwhelmingly Asiatic from the actual and geographical point of view. She is Asiatic also from the standpoint of sentiment, and because she was not allowed to be European.

The new attitude of Asia is alike sinister and startling. For the moment we may put Japan upon one side, while not allowing ourselves to forget that Japan intends to be the leader of Asia, and that all considerations of her sectional interests must be subservient to her greater interests, which include the whole of Asia. But what about India? We may ignore the silly people who talk about the oppression of India, and who suppose that India is yearning for ballot-boxes and boards of supervisors. India in the mass is wholly indifferent to such things. India is thinking about the Sultan of Turkey and about Mecca and the holy places. India—at least Mohammedan India—is stricken to the heart because of the threat against the Sultan and because the holy places are in the hands of infidels—that is to say of the British and the French. The deputation of Indian Mohammedans who interviewed the Pope last week enumerated their grievances, and they had nothing to say about ballot-boxes or democracies. They have not the faintest interest in such things. Their chief complaint was that "we can not tolerate British and French mandates over places where the Mussulmans consider themselves as God's mandatories." There is something refreshing about that declaration and something heroic about the men who made it. The whole white world, like a sack of rattlesnakes, is fighting and screaming for concessions, mandates, oil wells, and minerals, but the world of Mohammedanism asks only for the intangible, for the continued right to act as mandatories of God in the guardianship of a few sacred tombs. Russia and the Mohammedan world stand side by side as despoiled and robbed, insulted and flouted by Christendom. There would be no Bolshevism today if Russia had been honestly treated at the peace conference and after. There would be no Asiatic problem today if the European had not persisted in the perilous delusion that God created the colored races to be hewers of wood and drawers of water for their temporary conquerors.

Europe has appealed to force for five hundred years and she is now confronted with a force greater than, her own. Russia alone has an army of three million veterans. Her advance westward will not be stopped by armistices nor by blockades. She is already on the German frontier. No matter what success may reward the Greeks, they can not prevent the Russian advance into Asia Minor. They can not prevent the fraternization of Russians and Asiatics any more than they can prevent the fraternization of Russians and Germans on the German frontier. It may be that the Russians will be momentarily satisfied with their military successes in Poland, but it is not likely. They intend to Bolshevise Poland and they intend to Bolshevise Germany. They intend to produce a general uprising in Asia, and they are likely enough to do these things unless Europe can stop her pawn-broking and her huckstering and realize that she is confronted with ideas that are not soluble by any of the only processes with which she seems to be familiar. But her day of grace is a short one. The shadows are closing in. SIDNEY CORYN.

INDIVIDUALITIES.

Frederick Warde, who recently celebrated his fiftieth anniversary on the stage, is now resting up preparatory to a season of lectures on "Fifty Years of Make-Believe." Mr. Warde is appearing each season in "The Mission Play" at Los Angeles, which has become an established institution during the California tourist season, and will terminate his lecture tour in December to return to the coast to resume his rôle in that pageant.

Mrs. Nathan Straus has given all her jewels, worth approximately $18,500, to the Zionist Organization of America, for the development of medical and health service in Palestine. Dr. Wise said that Mrs. Straus made her gift at the same time her husband contributed $100,000 as the first installment of a fund for the establishment of a medical research and health service department for the Hebrew University of Jerusalem for the benefit of all races and creeds in the land.

"Look for the beautiful in ordinary things. It is always there. Use your imagination, let it guide you, and you will find that the whole world is beautiful and interesting." Miss Louise Everhardy of the Kansas State Agricultural College has demonstrated that she can not only play this game herself, but that she can help others to find the delightful and the attractive in the common, everyday things of life. Sometimes spring can last the whole year. Birds and flowers suggest spring. Miss Everhardy teaches her students to combine birds and flowers in their china paintings and so have the beauty of spring always before them.

After spending forty years teaching school, house-keeping for her family, and studying for a college degree, all at the same time, Mrs. Sallie Fogg Loudin, a teacher in the Morgantown (West Virginia) High School and the mother of five grown children, received her A. B. degree at West Virginia University this year. Mrs. Loudin is planning to continue teaching and studying until she gets her Master's degree also. Mrs. Loudin was a schoolteacher when she married a West Virginia lumberman. Twenty years later business reverses compelled her to begin teaching again. She sought teaching work at Morgantown, where the state university was located. There she took special courses at night and during the summers and in eight years completed her work, which gave her the coveted degree this spring.

Mr. George Suter has the rare and highly honorable distinction of being the oldest carpenter in the United States (possibly in the entire world) who is still on the job every day. He will be eighty-nine next November. Born at Washington in 1832, Mr. Suter has never lived more than three blocks from the place of his birth. He has quietly watched Washington grow from a mere country village to a city of nearly half a million and, in his way, has had an important part in its development. Sixty-three years ago—1857—he worked as a carpenter during the construction of one of the wings of the United States Treasury; for twenty years after its completion he served as cabinetmaker in that building. From there he went to the State, War and Navy Building, assisting in the construction of the west and north wings. With such experience in government buildings it was only natural that he should be employed when the Library of Congress was begun. Every presidential inauguration procession from William Henry Harrison to Woodrow Wilson has been viewed by this man.

Jenny Kissed Me!

Jenny kissed me when we met,
Jumping from the chair she sat in;
Time, you thief! who love to get Sweets into your list, put that in.
Say I'm weary, say I'm sad;
Say that health and wealth have missed me;
Say I'm growing old, but add—
Jenny kissed me!

Come Into the Garden, Maud.

Come into the garden, Maud,
For the black hat, night, has flown!
Come into the garden, Maud,
I am here at the gate alone;
And the woodbine spices are wafted abroad,
And the musk of the roses blown.
For a breeze of morning moves,
And the planet of love is on high.
Beginning to faint in the light that she loves,
On a bed of daffodil sky,—
To faint in the light of the sun that she loves,
To faint in its light, and to die.

All night have the roses heard
The flute, violin, hassoos;
All night has the casement jessamine stirred
To the dancers dancing in tune,—
Till a silence fell with the waking bird,
And a hush with the setting moon.

I said to the lily, "There is hut one
With whom she has heart to be gay.
When will the dancers leave her alone?
She is weary of dance and play."
Now half to the setting moon are gone,
And half to the rising day;
Low on the sand and loud on the stone
The last wheel echoes away.

I said to the rose, "The brief night goes
In hahble and revel and wine.
O young lord-lover, what sighs are those
For one that will never be thine?
But mine, but mine," so I sware to the rose,
"For ever and ever mine!"

And the soul of the rose went into my blood,
As the music clashed in the hall;
And long by the garden lake I stood,
For I heard your rivulet fall
From the lake to the meadow and on to the wood
Our wood, that is dearer than all;

From the meadow your walks have left so sweet:
That, whenever a March wind sighs,
He sets the jewel-print of your feet
In violets blue as your eyes,
To the woody hollows in which we meet,
And the valleys of Paradise.

The slender acacia would not shake
One long milk-bloom on the tree;
The white lake-blossom fell into the lake,
As the pimpernel dozed on the lea;
But the rose was awake all night for your sake,
Knowing your promise to me;
The lilies and roses were all awake,
They sighed for the dawn and thee.

Queen rose of the rosebud garden of girls,
Come hither! the dances are done;
In gloss of satin and glimmer of pearls,
Queen lily and rose in one;
Shine out, little head, sunning over with curls,
To the flowers, and be their sun.

There has fallen a splendid tear
From the passion-flower at the gate,
She is coming, my dove, my dear;
She is coming, my life, my fate!
The red rose cries, "She is near, she is near!"
And the white rose weeps, "She is late!"
The larkspur listens, "I hear, I hear!"
And the lily whispers, "I wait."

She is coming, my own, my sweet!
Were it ever so airy a tread,
My heart would hear her and beat,
Were it earth in an earthy bed;
My dust would hear her and beat,
Had I lain for a century dead;
Would start and tremble under her feet,
And blossom in purple and red.

—Alfred Tennyson.

The Origin of the Harp.

'Tis believed that this harp, which I wake now for thee,
Was a Siren of old, who sung under the sea;
And who often, at eve, through the bright hallow roved,
To meet on the green shore, a youth whom she loved.

But she loved him in vain, for he left her to weep,
And in tears, all the night, her gold ringlets to steep,
Till Heaven looked with pity on true love so warm,
And changed to this soft harp the sea-maiden's form.

Still her hosom rose fair—still her cheek smiled the same,
While her sea-beauties gracefully curled round the frame;
And her hair, shedding tear-drops from all its bright rings,
Fell o'er her white arm, to make the gold strings!

Hence it came, that this soft harp so long hath been known
To mingle love's language with sorrow's sad tone;
Till thou didst divide them, and teach the fond lay
To be love when I'm near thee, and grief when away!

A St. Louis bookseller has proved to his own satisfaction that his city represents a higher literary culture than does Boston. In Boston 43 per cent. of the book buyers choose fiction, while in St. Louis the fiction buyers comprise only 23 per cent. of the whole.

"QUEEN LUCIA."

Mr. E. F. Benson Writes Another Novel of the Follies and Fancies of Fashionable Folk.

The novelist may consider his work well done if he succeeds in holding up to us a mirror wherein we may see the reflection of our follies. It is a task too often neglected in favor of the merely amusing, but this is not a charge that can be brought against Mr. E. F. Benson, whose ridicule is none the less effective because it is always so kindly. Mr. Benson has now some fourteen or fifteen novels to his credit, and while his latest work, "Queen Lucia," is not his best, it is none the less rich in the insight and the humor that we have learned to associate with his clever pen.

Mr. Benson chooses for his target the society circle of an English country town with its rival leaders and its unceasing competition in novelties and sensations. Mrs. Lucia Lucas usually has things all her own way. She indulges in ooby talk when she is in playful mood, and chatters Italian sentences with her husband, who writes verses and publishes them at his own expense. And there is Mrs. Quantock, who tries to wrest the palm from Mrs. Lucas, but is usually foiled by that lady's astute generalship. After Mr. Lucas has returned from a trip to London she receives her husband's report of the social developments during her absence:

"Well, as I told you in one of my letters," said he, "Mrs. Quantock showed signs of being a little off with Christian Science. She had a cold, and though she recited the True Statement of Being just as frequently as before, her cold got no better. But when I saw her on Tuesday last, unless it was Wednesday, no, it couldn't have been Wednesday, so it must have been Tuesday."

"Whenever it was then," interrupted his wife, brilliantly summing up his indecision.

"Yes; whenever it was, as you say, on that occasion Mrs. Quantock was very full of some Indian philosophy which made you quite well at once. What did she call it now? Yoga! Yes, that was it!"

"And then?" asked Lucia.

"Well, it appears you must have a teacher in Yoga or else you may injure yourself. You have to breathe deeply and say 'Om'—"

"Say what?"

"Om. I understand the ejaculation to be Om. And there are very curious physical exercises; you have to hold your ear with one hand and your toes with the other, and you may strain yourself unless you do it properly. That was the general gist of it."

"And shall we come to the Indian soon?" said Lucia.

"Carissima, you have come to him already. I suggest that Mrs. Quantock has applied for a teacher and got him. Ecco!"

Mrs. Quantock, it seems, had found a book on Oriental philosophy and it had opened, "all of its own accord," at the chapter dealing with Yoga. She had written for information and had learned that one must have a teacher, and then suddenly an Indian gentleman had arrived unannounced and had said: "Beloved lady, I am the teacher you asked for; I am your Guru. Peace be to this house! Om!"

Mrs. Lucas had by this time got her view of Mrs. Quantock's letter into perfect focus, and she read on without missing a word. "Is it not wonderful, dearest Lucia," it ran, "that my desire for light should have been so instantly answered? And yet my Guru tells me that it always happens so. I was sent to him, and he was sent to me, just like that! He had been expecting some call when my letter asking for guidance came, and he started at once because he knew he was sent. Fancy! I don't even know his name, and his religion forbids him to tell it to me. He is just my Guru, my guide, and he is going to be with me as long as he knows I need him to show me the True Path. He has the spare bedroom and the little room adjoining where he meditates and does Postures and Pranayama, which is breathing. If you persevere in them under instruction, you have perfect health and youth, and my cold is gone already. He is a Brahmin of the very highest caste, indeed caste means nothing to him any longer, just as a Baronet and an honorable must seem about the same thing to the king. He comes from Benares, where he used to meditate all day by the Ganges, and I can see for myself that he is a person of the most extraordinary sanctity. But he can meditate just as well in my little room, for he says he was never in any house that had such a wonderful atmosphere. He has no money at all, which is so beautiful of him, and looked so pained and disappointed when I asked him if I might not give him some. He doesn't even know how he got here from London; he doesn't think he came by train, so perhaps he was wafted here in some astral manner. He looked so heveled, too, when I said the word 'money,' and evidently he had to think what it was, because it is so long since it has meant anything to him. So if he wants anything, I have told him to go into any shop and ask that it shall be put down to me. He has often been without food or sleep for days together when he is meditating. Just think!"

Lucia has a sort of tame cat, Georgie Pillson by name, but usually known to the socially elect as Georgie. Of course there was no scandal, nor cause for it. Georgie has not enough red blood to make a scandal, but he is in and out of Lucia's house all day long, exchanging baby talk and reading with her the masterpieces of literature:

Georgie (he was Georgie or Mr. Georgie, never Pillson to the whole of Risholme) was not an obtrusively masculine sort of person. Such masculinity as he was possessed of was boyish rather than adult, and the most important ingredients in his nature were womanish. He had, in common with the rest of Risholme, strong artistic tastes, and in addition to playing the piano, made charming little water-color sketches, many of which he framed at his own expense and gave to friends, with slightly sentimental titles, neatly printed in gilt letters on the mount. "Golden Autumn Woodland," "Bleak December," "Yellow Daffodils," "Roses of Summer" were perhaps his most notable series, and these he had given to Lucia, on the occasion of four successive birthdays. He did portraits as well in pastel; these were of two types, elderly ladies in lace caps with a row of pearls, and boys in cricket shirts with their sleeves rolled up. He was not very good at eyes, so his sitters always were looking down, but he was excellent at smiles, and the old ladies smiled patiently and sweetly, and the boys gayly. But his finest accomplishment was needlework and his house was full of the creations of his needle, woolwork curtains, petit-point chair seats, and silk embroideries framed and glazed. Next to Lucia he was the hardest worked inhabitant of Risholme, but not being so strong as the Queen, he had often to go away for little rests by the seaside. Traveling by train fussed him a good deal, for he might not be able to get a corner seat, or somebody with a pipe or a baby might get into his carriage, or the porter might be rough with his luggage, so he always went in his car to some neighboring watering-place where they knew him. Dicky, his handsome young chauffeur, drove him, and by Dicky's side sat Foljambe, his very pretty parlor-maid who valetted him. If Dicky took the wrong turn his master called "Naughty boy" through the tube, and Foljambe smiled respectfully. For the month of August, his two plain strapping sisters (Hermione and Ursula alas!) always came to stay with him. They liked pigs and dogs and otter-hunting and mutton-chops, and were rather a discordant element in Risholme. But Georgie had a kind heart, and never even debated whether he should ask Hermie and Ursy or not, though he had to do a great deal of tidying up after they had gone.

Mrs. Quantock's husband is, unfortunately, an unbeliever. He looks somewhat askance at the Guru, although his hostility is mitigated by the said Guru's manifest skill in cookery, an art that ranks highly in Mr. Quantock's estimation and that has already dissipated one or two domestic storms. But Mr. Quantock naturally wants to know what to expect:

"Well, now, about this Golliwog—haha—I should say Guru, my dear," he began, "what's going to happen?"

Daisy Quantock drew in her breath sharply and winced at this irreverence, but quickly remembered that she must always be sending out messages of love, north, east, south, and west. So she sent a rather spiky one in the direction of her husband, who was sitting due east, so that it probably got to him at once, and smiled the particular hard firm smile which was an heirloom inherited from her last rule of life.

"No one knows," she said brightly. "Even the Guides can't tell where and when a Guru may be called."

"Then do you propose he should stop here till he's called somewhere else?"

"I don't propose anything," she said. "It's not in my hands."

Under the calming influence of the fish curry, Robert remained still placid.

"He's a first-rate cook anyhow," he said. "Can't you engage him as that? Call to the kitchen, you know."

"Darling!" said Mrs. Quantock, sending out more love. But she had a quick temper, and indeed the two were out-poured together, like hot and cold taps turned on in a bath. The pellucid stream of love served to keep her temper moderately cool.

"Well, ask him," suggested Mr. Quantock, "as you say, you never can tell where a Guru may be called. Give him forty pounds a year and beer money."

"Beer!" began Mrs. Quantock, when she suddenly remembered Georgie's story about Rush and the Guru and the brandy-bottle, and stopped.

"Yes, dear, I said 'beer,'" remarked Robert a little irritably, "and in any case I insist that you dismiss your present cook. You only took her because she was a Christian Scientist, and you've left that little sheep-fold now. You used to talk about false claims I remember. Well her claim to be a cook is the falsest I ever heard of. I'd sooner take my chance with an itinerant organ grinder. But that fish-curry tonight and that other thing last night, that's what I mean by good eating."

The thought even of food always calmed Robert's savage breast; it blew upon him as the wind on an Æolian harp hung in the trees, evoking faint sweet sounds.

"I'm sure, my dear," he said, "that I shall be willing to fall in with any pleasant arrangement about your Guru, but it really isn't unreasonable in me to ask what sort of arrangement you propose. I haven't a word to say against him, especially when he goes to the kitchen: I only want to know if he is going to stop here a night or two or a year or two. Talk to him about it tomorrow with my love. I wonder if he can make bisque soup."

The arrival in the town of Miss Olga Bracely, the celebrated opera singer, has somewhat the effect of a bomb. Mrs. Lucas is not sure whether the distinguished stranger can be attached to her chariot wheels or whether she herself may be ousted from the driver's seat. She invites Olga to a party at her house and persuades her to sing:

Olga was in the music-room when the crowd had congested the hall. People were introduced to her, and sank down into the nearest chairs. Mrs. Antrobus took up her old place by the keyboard of the piano. Everybody seemed to be expecting something, and by degrees the import of their longing was borne in upon Olga. They waited, and waited and waited, much as she had waited for a cigarette the evening before. She looked at the piano, and there was a comfortable murmur from her audience. She looked at Lucia, who gave a great gasp, and said nothing at all. She was the only person present who was standing now except her hostess, and Mrs. Weston's gardener, who had wheeled his mistress' chair into an admirable position for hearing. She was not too well pleased, but after all . . .

"Would you like me to sing?" she asked Lucia. "Yes? Ah, there's a copy of Siegfried. Do you play?"

Lucia could not smile any more than she was smiling already.

"Is it very diffy?" she asked. "Could I read it, Georgie? Shall I try?"

She slid onto the music-stool.

"Me to begin?" she asked, finding that Olga had opened the book at the salutation of Brunnhilde, which Lucia had practiced so diligently all the morning.

She got no answer. Olga, standing by her, had assumed a perfectly different aspect. For her gayety, her lightness was substituted some air of intense concentrated seriousness which Lucia did not understand at all. She was looking straight in front of her, gathering herself in, and paying not the smallest attention to Lucia or anybody else.

"One, two," said Lucia. "Three. Now," and she plunged wildly into a sea of demi-semi-quavers. Olga had just opened her mouth, but shut it again.

"No," she said. "Once more," and she whistled the motif.

"Oh! it's so diffy!" said Lucia beginning again. "Georgie! Turn over!"

Georgie turned over, and Lucia, counting audibly to herself, made an incomparable mess all over the piano.

Olga turned to her accompanist.

"Shall I try?" she said.

She sat down to the piano, and made some sort of sketch of the accompaniment, simplifying, and yet retaining the essence. And then she sang.

Olga returns the hospitality by giving a party of her own, but it is a very different sort of party. Every one was there, but Mrs. Lucas comes late and so misses a dance by Olga, and as every one is applauding Olga, Mrs. Lucas is hardly noticed, which of course is very annoying. Olga offers a cigarette to the horrified Lucia, who replies that she never smokes:

"Oh, you should learn," said Olga. "Now let's play clumps. Does every one know clumps? If they don't they will find out. Or shall we dance? There's the gramophone to dance to."

Lucia put up her hands in playful position.

"Oh please, no gramophone!" she said.

"Oh, don't you like it?" said Olga. "It's so horrible that I adore it, as I adore dreadful creatures in an aquarium. But I think we won't dance till after supper. We'll have supper extremely soon, partly because I am dying of famine, and partly because people are sillier afterwards. But just one game of clumps first. Let's see; there are but enough for four clumps. Please make four clumps everybody, and—and will you and two more go out with Mr. Georgie, Mrs. Lucas? We will be as quick as we can, and we won't think of anything that will make Mr. Georgie blush. Oh, there he is! He heard!"

Olga's intense enjoyment of her own party was rapidly galvanizing everybody into a much keener gayety than was at all usual in Risholme, where as a rule the hostess was somewhat anxious and watchful, fearing that her guests were not amusing themselves, and that the sandwiches would give out. There was a sit-down supper when the clumps were over (Mrs. Quantock had been the first to guess Beethoven's little toe on his right foot, which made Lucia wince) and there were not enough men and maids to wait, and so people foraged for themselves, and Olga paraded up and down the room with a bottle of champagne in one hand and a dish of lobster salad in the other. She sat for a minute or two first at one table and then at another, and asked silly riddles, and sent to the kitchen for a ham, and put out all the electric lights by mistake, when she meant to turn on some more. Then when supper was over they all took their seats back into the music-room and played musical chairs, at the end of which Mrs. Quantock was left in with Olga, and it was believed that she said "Damn" when Mrs. Quantock won. Georgie was in charge of the gramophone, which supplied deadly music, quite forgetting that this was agony to Lucia, and not even being aware when she made a sign to Peppino, and went away having a cobbler's at-home all to herself. Nobody noticed when Saturday ended and Sunday began, for Georgie and Colonel Boucher were cock-fighting on the floor, Georgie screaming out "How tarsome" when he was upset, and Colonel Boucher, very red in the face, saying "Haw, hum. Never thought I should romp again like this. By Jove, most amusing!" Georgie was the last to leave and did not notice till he was half-way home that he had a ham-frill adorning his shirt front. He hoped that it had been Olga who put it there, when he had to walk blind-fold across the floor and try to keep in a straight line.

Next day is Sunday and no one can see Olga in church, which is rather saddening, and conclusive evidence that the great singer can never really "belong":

Then came a stupefying surprise as Mr. Rumbold walked from his stall to the pulpit for the sermon. Generally he gave out the number of the short anthem which accompanied this manoeuvre, but today he made no such announcement. A discreet curtain hid the organist from the congregation, and veiled his gymnastics with the stops and his antic dancing on the pedals, and now when Mr. Rumbold moved from his stall, there came from the organ the short introduction to Bach's "Mein Glaubige Herz," which even Lucia had allowed to be nearly "equal" to Beethoven. And then came the voice. . . .

The reaction after the romp last night went out like a snuffed candle at this divine singing, which was charged with the joyfulness of some heavenly child. It grew loud and soft, it rang out again, it lingered and tarried, it quickened into the ultimate triumph. No singing could have been simpler, but that simplicity could only have sprung from the highest art. But now the art was wholly unconscious; it was part of the singer, who but praised God as the thrushes do. She who had made gayety last night made worship this morning.

As they sat down for the discourse, Colonel Boucher discreetly whispered to Georgie "By Jove." And George rather more audibly answered "Adorable!" Mrs. Weston drew a half-a-crown from her purse instead of her usual shilling, to be ready for the offertory, and Mrs. Quantock wondered if she was too old to learn to sing. . . .

It is all capital fun from beginning to end. The Guru is identified as a cook at a London restaurant and he ingloriously disappears after robbing the houses of his patronesses and leaving behind in his closet a goodly array of empty whisky bottles. But the Guru's place is speedily occupied by the medium and society turns its attention to the planchette. But the medium, also, falls from grace, and when eventually we leave these good ladies they are beginning a new enthusiasm for a certain elixir that is guaranteed to add several inches to one's height. And those who mix in such chaste circles as these are inclined to believe that Mr. Benson has not been guilty of any very serious exaggeration.

It was the Italian physicist Salvioni who devised a microbalance of such extreme delicacy that it clearly demonstrates the loss of weight of musk by volatilization. Thus the invisible perfume floating off in the air is indirectly weighed. The essential part of the apparatus is a very thin thread of glass fixed at one end and extended horizontally. The microscopic objects to be weighed are placed upon the glass thread near its free end and the amount of flexure produced is observed with a microscope magnifying 1000 diameters. A mote weighing one-thousandth of a milligram perceptibly bends the thread.

Shells increase in destructiveness more than in proportion to their inches. A twelve-inch shell is times more dangerous than a six-inch one.

BANKING AND INVESTMENT NEWS.

San Francisco's bank clearings for the week ending July 31, 1920, were $150,700,000; for the corresponding week of last year, $145,200,000; a gain of $5,500,000.

Total gold reserves of the local Federal Reserve Bank decreased $9,001,000, to $163,038,000 during the week ending July 30th, according to the bank's weekly statement issued Saturday. Gold held by member banks fell off $5,167,000.

Resources showed a loss of $9,042,000, to $417,081,000, which may be due to the reduction in uncollected items and other deductions from gross deposits. Bills on hand gained $9,596,000 to $202,393,000, while total earning assets rose $7,647,000.

The unfitness of silver as a monetary standard has again been demonstrated by the recent once the political atmosphere has cleared, will be at least as large as before."

In discussing the probable future price of silver the bank says:

"The result of the purchase provisions of the Pittman Act and of the mint regulations is to establish two separate and distinct markets and quotations for silver. In the United States domestic commercial silver .999 fine is virtually pegged at 99 1/2 cents. If the price for foreign silver should rise above $1 per ounce treasury purchases would probably automatically cease. But the price would probably not get much above $1. The annual output of the United States is about one-third that of the entire world, and a price materially above $1 would add this amount to market supply, increasing it possibly by one-half. It would therefore seem that the price could at most rule only fractionally higher than the Pittman law figure, unless it is to be supposed that demand and supply should both be abnormal as during the war period.

"It has frequently been asserted that a greater use of silver as standard or redemption money would be inevitable as a means of stabilizing inflated paper currencies, particularly in view of the decline of gold production. But it is apparent that if new silver is to be relied on for this purpose it will be many years before adequate reserves for existing issues can be accumulated. Unless the price of silver goes above $1 per fine ounce, or the purchase clause of the Pittman Act is repealed, the output of the United States will not for at least three years be available for these reserves. If silver is so used, either it must be replaced by some countries as the exclusive monetary standard or a legal ratio between the values of gold and silver must be settled upon. Either alternative involves the question of bimetalism.

"A return to bimetalism would in all probability mean a return to an alternating standard, now of gold, now of silver, such as the world sought relief from when it chose gold as the more stable monetary standard.

"The adoption of a single silver standard by some countries while other important commercial nations use gold would result in giving the foreign exchanges with the silver countries a fluctuating par of exchange such as China now has. The conduct of international business would thereby be interfered with rather than facilitated, and the proposal is therefore undesirable."

General business still continues of a very choppy nature, with some trades hard put to it to supply demands and others showing lack of orders. The one thing needful to assist most largely in the return to normal trade conditions, following the revolutionary effects of the war, is a readjustment in labor affairs. Ever since the armistice there has been a sort of happy-go-lucky effort to do business with labor ever asking greater consideration for a small amount of work. Employing interests generally have in the past been quite generous in their attitude toward their employees, and some of the advances in wages have seemed sensational in the extreme, especially to those who toil in the unorganized branches and have been either unwilling or unable to profiteer. The successes of labor unions in bringing about increasing wages and decreasing hours of work have been so marked as to fire the ambitions of the more radical element that has been consistently attempting to push the country along the road to Bolshevism. The United States Steel Corporation accepted the challenge from this element last year and beat it to a standstill in the fight for the open-shop principle. Railroad labor, however, numbering close to two million men, has been thoroughly organized from the labor-union standpoint. During government operations of the railroads it was situations and not jobs that were held down by the employees. Granting that their average wage was not sufficient to enable them to cope with the high cost of living successfully, still it must be admitted that many, if not a great majority of them, failed to do their own part in hard work to help in cutting down the cost of things.

This week the committee on railroad wages has made an award which, on the average, will increase the annual income of every one employed on the railroads to the extent of over $300 a year. Even before the award was made radicals in the railway unions threatened and predicted a general strike for more liberal concessions. The Pennsylvania Railroad countered the threat by laying off more than 12,000 employees, and the fight is on to determine whether men who work with their hands are going to give value received in hard work or are going to be permitted to loaf on the job. Popular opinion can run in only one direction in regard to this whole situation, which will develop rapidly and happily for the larger interests of the nation.

The increased freight rates shortly to be announced should solve the remaining railroad problems. Efficient operation of the railroads and a proper readjustment of labor conditions are important elements that will affect the market prices of most commodities. A great many lines, such as woolen, silk, leather, and rubber, together with some of the metals, have been over-produced as compared to current demand, but the underlying demand is large for all of these things, and periods of shut-down plants and reduced production will be followed, if things come out all right, by a prolonged era of more normal demand and at least fair prices as compared to production costs.

The relatively very high prices for cotton, together with upset trade affairs, have caused an immense amount of short selling in the cotton markets, but latterly, helped by unfavorable weather conditions, the bears on cotton have had a pretty hard time of it. We are now entering the most critical period for the new crop and, unless conditions improve a good deal, nearby cotton options will probably be subject of violent advances at times.

In the Northwest, despite the inroads of black rust, there is talk of a spring wheat crop double that of last year. Incidentally, the outlook for small grains is reported as exceedingly bright in that territory. Wheat prices have broken badly and rallied some since trading was resumed. Europe has been buying a good deal of grain here lately and also cotton, and the export demand for foodstuffs should continue large. Wheat prices, and prices of other grains for that matter, however, will depend on the progress of the crops more than anything else. Intensive railroading should help the shipping situation.

The steel and iron trades have been marking time, in a way, waiting on the railroad situation to develop. Meanwhile, prices have been pretty stiff, especially for pig-iron. Building has been hampered by labor conditions, but the throwing of men out of employment by the railroads and in some special trades should help the building labor situation to an extent. Building plans are going ahead for a big constructive campaign in the more populous sections of the country just as soon as shipping and labor conditions are right. The equipment concerns should have all the work they can attend to for years to come, so that the prospect is bright for good times in iron and steel.

The railway wage award, seemingly ample as the advances are, of course finds labor agitators attempting to provoke new strikes. However, the stock market has been through railroad strikes, and for many months past has not been free from the threats of railroad strikes, and it is not reasonable to suppose that in the present critical time in the affairs of the country the labor agitators are going to be given a free hand.

Presumably the freight-rate adjustment will be announced very shortly, and this should not only absorb the increased wages, but should also be large enough to restore railroad credit and make it possible for the railroad managements to solve our transportation problems by resumption of that efficiency that was the normal thing for the decade prior to the war.

There has been a good deal of quiet buying in the market for railroad stocks recently on the part of very wealthy individuals who feel that, wherever else happens, unless the country is to go to the Bolshevik dogs, railroad stocks have about seen their worst, while in the event that business and financial conditions are favorable in the next administration there will be reasonable hope for the same sort of increase in railroad security values that has occurred following every one of our financial panics heretofore.

Much of this buying is being done by far-sighted men who prefer to have their money invested in non-dividend paying securities which they believe will actually grow in value faster than the normal interest rate. These wealthy interests are not any too anxious, of course, to pay enormous taxes, and they can easily afford to wait for returns on their investment until the time when income-tax considerations will not be so important. Consequently stocks like Southern Railway, St. Louis and San Francisco, Missouri Pacific, Rock Island, Pittsburgh and West Virginia, Western Pacific, Baltimore and Ohio, St. Paul, and even New Haven and the Eries, among others, are being absorbed in this manner.

General business is very erratic, and consequently the market for industrial securities is also exceedingly irregular. Important banking interests feel that once the railroad situation is settled right and the freight-car congestion is relieved, there will be no more coal shortage and there will also be a definitely favorable turn in the money situation, so that even trades that seem now to be in the doldrums will again be found prospering.

The stock market has gone through a reaction which has wiped out the more recent advances, but again seems in position to respond very favorably to good news of importance.

With the sale of $1,500,000 State of Oregon highway bonds at 1.62 points over the price paid for a similar issue a month ago and the rapid sale of $20,000,000 of United States Rubber Company notes, bond dealers generally are agreed that prices of securities are on the rise, according to the Freeman, Smith & Camp

Company, bond dealers of San Francisco and Portland. The price paid for the highway bonds indicates a much improved market in the East, where most of the state issues are sold.

The price of a month ago for similar bonds was 87.62, while the high price during the week for the new issue was 89.34, or the difference of 1.62. The United States Rubber Company loan was announced Monday morning and the syndicate books were closed before 3 o'clock the same day. This, with the advance in price of the Armour notes, the government of Switzerland bonds, and Belgian government bonds, and a stabilization of Liberty and Victory bond prices indicates that the turning point has been reached and prices are well on the return to normal.

"With the increase in values," says Mr. Smith, "the soundest thing people can do today is to invest their earnings in long-term bonds and hold them, because now it is possible to receive an interest return unheard of a few years ago, and which may be impossible to obtain a few years hence. Although commodity prices are high, sound investments are cheap today, and conditions that go to make commodity prices will conversely tend to make security prices higher. By buying long-term bonds every 50 cents invested now will bring about 75 cents or more worth of purchasing power long before the bonds mature."

Recent action taken by the chief executives of the railways, not only of the greatest significance and importance under present conditions, but is unprecedented in the history of American railroads (declares the Railway Age in an editorial). On the recommendation of their advisory committee, which recently was created, they have set up certain standards of efficiency of operation for the railways as a whole which, by resolutions unanimously adopted, they have pledged themselves to make every effort to attain. This is the first time any such action ever was taken by the railways collectively. The purpose is to relieve the present dire transportation situation in the shortest possible time. The significant feature of the standards set up is that they are higher than any corresponding standards hitherto attained in the actual operation of the railroads of the United States, and are probably higher than ever were attained in the operation of the railroads of any country.

The first standard is "an average daily minimum movement of freight cars of not less than thirty miles per day." The average movement per car per day under government operation in 1918 was 24.6 miles and in 1919 23.1 miles. The greatest average movement ever attained in any year was in 1916, when it was 26.9 miles. If the railways should accomplish what they have set out to do, it would mean practically five miles per car per day more than was made under unified gov-metal for silver. As a result of these developments the demand for the metal for coinage purposes slackened, and today the dependence of the world on silver for coins is less widespread than it was.

The bank emphasizes as an important factor in the high price of silver the decline in production, particularly in Mexico, where, largely because of political disturbances, the output fell from 71,000,000 ounces in 1913 to 28,000,000 ounces in 1914, only to fluctuate between the latter figure and 63,000,000 ounces in 1919. There is no evidence, the bank says, that the mines in Mexico are becoming naturally less productive, and "there is every reason to believe that the Mexican output, ernment control in 1918, and would be equivalent to adding four hundred to five hundred thousand cars to the available equipment.

The second standard set up is "an average loading of thirty tons per car." The highest average ever attained was in 1919, when it was 29.1 cars. An increase of one ton in the average load per loaded car would be equivalent to adding from 50,000 to 75,000 to the available supply of cars.

The third standard established is "the reduction of bad order cars to a maximum of 4 per cent. of the total owned." The last report upon the subject showed 7.4 per cent., or about 178,000 of all the freight cars of the United States in bad order. A reduction of this to 4 per cent. would increase the useful available supply of cars by about 80,000.

The fourth and fifth standards set up are "an early and substantial reduction in the number of locomotives unfit for service" and "more effective efforts to bring about the return of cars to the owner roads."

"Much good work is spoiled for the want of a little more." The thought is credited to E. H. Harriman, master mind of the railroad world in his day. What a wealth of wisdom is crammed into those dozen words! They might well be emblazoned over the entrance to every office and factory, so that the conviction of their truth could be written indelibly on the consciousness of every worker—and that means every American who is worthy of the name.

Among human frailties is a more or less marked tendency toward physical and mental laziness. Only constant striving can overcome this inertia and lessen its effect on the quantity and quality of productive effort. Many times we fail to realize that we are facing a crisis which is to measure the power we possess, and unless we are on guard the senses become more and more dulled to the comprehension that the loss of an asset vital to development is at stake—self-confidence and self-proved capacity to grow. But most of the time we are conscious of our reluctance to "face the music," to tackle a task somewhat out of the ordinary and requiring unusual effort or concentration—and to do the job in a fashion worthy of our true, if undeveloped, capacities. Then is put to the test the mettle of which we are made. Shall we rise to the emergency, or shall we confess defeat?

And when, with one extra urge, with all the might of our resourcefulness, we do achieve the objective, what a stimulus it is, what an inspiration to the setting ahead of bigger and greater aims. It is the law of development of man's power.

Indeed, it is the "little more" work that counts. Two powerful sprinters fly down the chalked lanes of the classic century, stride for stride—ninety yards, ninety-five yards; but it is to the runner that calls forth the greater degree of reserve power in the final lunge at the tape that the race goes.—Norman F. D'Evelyn, editor of the Sperry Family.

A professional man in the West who owns government and municipal bonds writes to the World's Work in New York that he is considering the investment of part of his savings in railroad bonds "such as the 4 and 4½ per cents of good record in the past and having fifteen or more years to run." His reason is, "These bonds can be bought to net a good rate upon the actual cash investment and will approach par as time goes on. This is, of course, a mild form of speculation, but I think I can afford to risk a few thousand in something not quite so sure as governments and municipals."

Sub letters as these are indications of a reviving confidence in railroad bonds. As yet the sign of advancing prices that the public usually follows is not evident, but those who answer inquiries in regard to investments can see a growing interest in the railroad issues. These indications may be worth the investor's consideration.

From the South a World's Work reader writes that he has been an investor in real estate, but is now considering selling his real estate and investing in railroad bonds. "What real estate I have bought has doubled in value," he writes. "What would you advise in regard to selling it this year and reinvesting the funds in low-price bonds, or bonds below par, that are really safe?"

Here is not only a business man who looks for railroad securities to improve in value, but here is one of our new bond buyers as well—one of that great number who never bought a bond until the Liberty Loans came along, on whom the financing of the business of this country and, to some extent, of other countries now depends. This new investor has been disappointed with his Liberty Bond investments; because of their severe market decline. Let us see if there is a good basis for his growing confidence in railroad bonds.

They are still selling around their recent low record prices. Not since the worst days of the civil war have railroad bonds sold as low as at present; during the panics of 1873, 1893, and 1907 they did not sell as low. As yet there has been no response in the market to the passage by Congress of a constructive transportation act. At first thought this seems hard to explain. But when one remembers that the execution of that act is in the hands of the same Interstate Commerce Commission that has caused most of the railroads' trouble of the past it does not seem so strange. Many investors who have been several times disappointed by the rulings of the commission in the past are now going to wait until they know definitely how the commission is going to treat the roads under the new law before they invest in more railroad securities. This is one of the reasons why there has been no response in the market to the passage of the new railroad act. A more important reason is the income-tax law. Those who have the most money to invest—that is, those who are affected by the super-taxes, now choose their investments with their eye on the income tax. That means that they are buying tax-exempt securities, such as municipal bonds, which give them a higher return, taxes considered, than they can realize on railroad bonds even at their present low prices. This leaves an opportunity for the small investor such as is seldom open to him, or one that will prove to be an opportunity, if the Interstate Commerce Commission in administering the new railroad measure adopts the same favorable attitude toward the roads that Congress showed in its consideration of their problems.

By the time this is read, or soon after, the commission will have authorized an advance in rates that the roads may charge under the new law. This will give the first indication as to whether its attitude toward the railroads has changed or not, and will, therefore, be of great importance to investors or prospective investors in railroad securities. It may have an immediate effect on the market. But underlying this decision by the commission as to rates, there are certain other fundamental factors in regard to the railroads—in the new railroad law itself, and in the very nature of the railroad case—that must have a greater influence in the long run.

The most fundamental of these is the growing public understanding of the railroad problem and of its relationship to general business. The public now realizes that low rates are not what it wants most from the railroads. For now that the roads are in an undernourished state because of low rates and are unable to give the best service, the public realizes that it is service it wants first. And it is now willing to pay for it. Witness the shipping and other business organizations that are supporting the roads' applications for substantial increases in rates. It is this public view of the question that Congress reflected in the new Transportation Act, and it is reasonable to expect that the Interstate Commerce Commission will be influenced by it. Instead of continuing solely a restraining body the public now wants it to be a helpful regulating body.

But the future of the railroads is no longer in the hands of the Interstate Commerce Commission to the same extent that it was in the past. Congress, in the new law, has laid down certain directions to be followed in the regulation of the roads that give to the commission a measure of what constitutes fairness as the public, through Congress, now sees it, that shall be used in determining the treatment the railroads shall receive. There is no reason to doubt that the commission is glad to have this measure prescribed for it. And as Congress will undoubtedly see that its measure is applied as it intended it should be, that measure is one of the most important things to be taken into consideration in connection with railroad investments. Not until just recently, however, was it possible to interpret the measure prescribed by Congress into earnings on railroad capital.

The new railroad law says that the Interstate Commerce Commission shall fix rates as nearly as possible to give 5½ or 6 per cent. return on the "fair valuation" of the railroad property employed in the service of the public. But "fair valuation" was an unknown quantity in this equation and therefore the answer could not be arrived at. Congress directed that the railroad valuation work being carried on by the commission be continued and that when final valuation figures are fixed they be used. It was left to the commission, however, to decide what figures it would use meanwhile for valuations. Would it be the roads' own property accounts as shown on their books? Well-informed people thought it would be; but there had been so many cries of "watered" capitalization in connection with these figures, not only from the yellow journals, but from uninformed Interstate Commerce Commissioners as well, that the public could feel no certainty in this matter.

Now the unknown quantity has been fairly definitely determined. Figures were recently made public covering the Interstate Commerce Commission's preliminary reports of the costs of reproducing fifty railroads of the country with the value of their land. These fifty roads represent about one-sixth of the railroad investment of the country. With a few exceptions, the larger and stronger roads are not included among them. Yet the cost of reproducing these fifty roads, at 1914 prices, plus the value of their lands, was more than they were capitalized for. When the figures for all the roads are completed the margin will be wider. No longer can the cry of "watered" capital be raised against the railroads as a whole. Next to the new railroad law itself, these figures are the most important contribution to the railroad case that has yet been made. They are a justification of the more favorable attitude of the public toward the railroads. They are likely to form the basis for renewed investment confidence in railroad bonds. They should be a strong argument with the Interstate Commerce Commission for a liberal attitude in regard to rates.

The Southern Pacific recently launched an extensive campaign to popularize the Indian Summer attractions of resorts in the high Sierra.

If the campaign is successful it is said that it will have the effect of introducing to thousands of tourists a region that is at the height of its charms during the months of September and October. Coöperating with the railroads many of the best-known resorts have announced that they will keep open so long as the patronage continues.

Handsomely lithographed posters emphasizing the Indian Summer idea are being printed in large quantities and will be displayed at effective points both here and in the East. These posters will be reinforced with attractive booklets and other literature.

Week-end fifteen-day excursion tickets will be on sale to and including September, and season tickets until September 30th—the latter being good until October 31, 1920.

"The fact is," said Charles S. Fee, passenger traffic manager, "the autumn months in the Sierra are ideal for outdoor life, and with the school vacation period over the resorts are able to offer visitors choice accommodations. We plan to make a particular effort to extend the period of travel to Lake Tahoe, Yosemite, the Sequoia and General Grant parks, the Kings and Kern River cañons, Huntington Lake, the Shasta regions, and other sections of the state where weather conditions are perfectly delightful to November 1st and frequently beyond that date."

It is hardly possible that the Federal Reserve Board will foment panicky conditions, especially on the eve of a presidential election, merely with the idea of bringing about lower living costs. Yet the Street becomes very nervous when call money rates rise, even though its financial commitments seem to be smaller than in years. The bears are alert to take advantage of every opportunity to hammer prices, and have succeeded latterly with good measure.

But the country is not going to rack and ruin, and Stock Exchange securities should turn around soon for a tremendous rise that will seek to discount the probable change in our own political affairs and the probable settlement of European complications.

Most of our larger industrial concerns are well fortified to withstand the changing weather that will prevail for quite some time in our world of trade. A very favorable feature is to be found in the better crop prospects, especially in the Southwest. The farmer's main trouble is lack of cars to ship his grain in. Railroads seem gradually to be solving the freight-car shortage, however, and as soon as they succeed in bringing affairs to normal again it would seem that the credit situation should be solved.

not show the gain that might have been expected following the reports of the Lackawanna and Republic companies. However, the present dividend was earned three times over, and the outlook for this section of the list is hardly as bearish as recent market quotations would suggest.

As prices come down in the business world there will be sinking spells in securities of companies that must write off inventory losses. Rails show a very sound undertone and it is to be hoped that the rate increases will solve their fiscal problems so that they in turn may successfully meet the demand for efficiency in transportation.

The War in Siberia.

The Allied treatment of Russia furnishes an example of human blundering without a parallel in the history of the world. A vicious wrongheadedness never before reached such depths as this. The Allies, wishing to destroy Bolshevism, attacked Russia herself, and enlisted all the forces of Russian patriotism on the side of Lenin. They identified Lenin and Russia, and forcibly aligned the people on the side of a tyranny that otherwise they would have overthrown. Finding an oasis of governmental decency in Siberia, the statesmen of Europe fatuously turned it into a Bolshevik desert. The Omsk government might have been a rallying point for the forces of Russian order, but the Allies broke their promises of support, sustained their individual favorites, maliciously obstructed one another, and finally drove the despairing and disgusted Siberians into the Bolshevik ranks. How far this dreary ineptitude was due to the clamor of ignorant democracies remains to be seen. It is conditions with which we have to deal, conditions that may yet write the blackest page of our war story.

The facts are clearly set forth by Colonel John Ward, C. B., C. M. G., M. P., in his book, "With the Die-Hards in Siberia." Writing primarily as a soldier and describing the military situation, he shows how that situation arose, the tangle of policies that strangled the Siberian government, the desperation of the people thus taught that their friends were more dangerous than their enemies, and the consequent triumph of the Red forces, quick to take advantage of a situation more favorable than their own best efforts could have produced and directly created by the political incapacities of their enemies. Colonel Ward writes a capital narrative that is obviously unprejudiced and that shows, not only sincerity, but a lucid recognition of political causes and their effects.

WITH THE DIE-HARDS IN SIBERIA. By Colonel John Ward, C. B., C. M. G., M. P. New York: George H. Doran Company.

The Last of the Grenvilles.

The hero of this story is Dickie Grenville, whose father is a retired commander in the British navy. The elder Grenville might have stepped bodily from the pages of an Elizabethan romance. He says that the Grenvilles have followed the sea for hundreds of years, and none of them ever made enough money to live on. Money, says the old sailor, rules the modern world, and he is determined that Dickie shall be the first of his line to own some. Then comes the war, and naturally the Grenvilles go back to sea and acquit themselves valiantly against the German Admiral von Spee. The author knows how to write a sea story and of those who go down to the sea in ships. His book is a delight.

THE LAST OF THE GRENVILLES. By Bennet Copplestone. New York: E. P. Dutton & Co.; $2.50.

Bluestone.

We are not sure that the poet does wisely in disclosing the mechanism of the workshop. We like to think of the poem springing full-fledged from the soul. The noise of the tools may sometimes be discordant.

Marguerite Wilkinson, in the introduction to her "Bluestone," tells us how she works. She says: "While I am making a lyric, after the mood becomes clear, after the idea and image emerge from consciousness, I sing it, and sometimes slowly, sometimes quite rapidly, the words take their places in lines that carry a tune, also. I am not giving conscious attention to the tune. Nor am I making an intellectual effort to combine words and music and get a certain effect. I am not thinking about the music. I am making a single-hearted and strong endeavor to say or sing what is felt and thought. Sometimes a lyric and the melody that belongs with it grow in my mind for a long time before they become vocal and can be set down on paper." It may be said that music and poetry are not constructed on exactly the same lines and that the effort to sing a lyric may be misleading. But a tree is known by its fruits, and these particular fruits are good. There are some few poems here that might have been improved or omitted and that show unfortunate traces of what may be called the singing method, but the collection as a whole will advance Mrs. Wilkinson's reputation. And it is already high.

BLUESTONE LYRICS. By Marguerite Wilkinson. New York: The Macmillan Company.

Young Hearts.

Mrs. J. E. Buckrose has an unusual aptitude for the writing of novels that have no particular plot, but that none the less hold the attention unwaveringly to the end. No other writer succeeds better in depicting phases of English life in their completeness and with photographic accuracy and detail.

In "Young Hearts" we have the story of a Yorkshire family of father, mother, and two daughters. Mr. Thompson finds that he has outlived his popularity as a public figurehead and reformer in his native town of Wressle, and so he decides to move to Muckleby and become a farmer. His younger daughter, Maude, has lost her lover in the war and believes herself to be inconsolable, although events prove differently. The elder girl, Helen, has been doing strenuous war work and now supposes herself to be indifferent to the opposite sex, although subsequent happenings cause her, also, to change her mind. The story consists of the love affairs of these two girls and a depiction of country life at Muckleby.

Novels of this sort have their distinct value.

as they certainly have their distinct interest. Containing nothing of the sensational and wholly innocent of the literary crime known as "punch," they represent human nature at its best and sweetest, by no means free of foibles, vanities, and follies, but always of the kind that call forth the benevolent smile. Mrs. Buckrose's name on a title-page is a guarantee of fictional excellence.

YOUNG HEARTS. By J. E. Buckrose. New York: George H. Doran Company.

The Function of the Poet.

It is surprising that we should have waited so long for James Russell Lowell's literary and critical essays. To most of us Lowell is a poet with a few imperishable compositions to his credit. At last we have an opportunity to read his prose writings rescued from old magazines and other such sources. As a result he must step into the first rank as a critic.

There are some sixteen essays in this volume, which takes its title from the first. Presumably the editor, Mr. Albert Mordell, believed this to be the most important, as perhaps it is. It appeared in the Century Magazine of January, 1894, and at once we are struck with Lowell's depreciation of the general tendency to suppose that we were then in the "after-dinner time of the world," and mankind "doomed hereafter forever to that kind of contented materialism which comes to good stomachs with the nuts and raisins." But Lowell believed that divine beauty would always have its messengers, who would trail "clouds of glory." He did not foresee the awful shock that was to be given to the complacency of our materialism.

Turning Mr. Lowell's pages, we come to many a strong and arresting sentence. Don Quixote, he tells us in his essay on "Humor, Wit, Fun, and Satire," is the most perfect character ever drafted. Sir John Falstaff is in a certain sense "always a gentleman," but Don Quixote, in everything that does not concern his monomania, is "a perfect gentleman and a good Christian besides." Lowell's "five indispensable authors" are Homer, Dante, Cervantes, Goethe, and Shakespeare, a selection that is unimpeachable, as also is his summary of their comparative functions. Other striking essays are devoted to Whittier, Poe, Thackeray, Henry James, and Longfellow. Admirable, too, is the essay on "Imagination," and another on "Poetry and Nationality." All these writings bear the mark of vigorous and constructive thought, while it need hardly be said that their diction is faultless.

THE FUNCTION OF THE POET AND OTHER ESSAYS. By James Russell Lowell. Boston: Houghton Mifflin Company; $5.

The Monroe Doctrine.

This volume appears in the National Science Series and has been wisely entrusted to Professor A. B. Hall, who first gives us a summary of the political events that led to the adoption of the Monroe Doctrine and then traces its extension and application under the stress of events. The author's citation of political documents is particularly useful.

Professor Hall combats the idea that the Monroe Doctrine may in some way be abrogated or nullified by the league of nations. Perhaps we need not now be particularly concerned with the results of a covenant that is so fast sinking into the position of an absurdity, but the contention, according to the author, has no validity so long as self-defense is left to the devices of individual nations. It may find new expressions, but its fundamental principles will in any case prevail.

THE MONROE DOCTRINE AND THE GREAT WAR. By A. B. Hall. Chicago: A. C. McClurg & Co.; 75 cents.

New York's Theatrical Supremacy.

According to Alexander Woollcott, one of New York's leading dramatic critics, the West may soon have a dramatic capital of its own. He is quite frank about it:

"As the theatrical capital of America, New York is showing signs of collapsing under the strain. In the closing weeks of an unprecedented season—a season in which more fine and creditable plays have come to light than ever before, and in which the most preposterous scales of prices have not served to cool the thirsty country's passion for playgoing, evidences are multiplying like rabbits that a vast continental belt, on which more than a hundred million people jostle one another for existence can not be adequately supplied with amusement from one headquarters. More and more distinct and threatening grow the murmurous protests from the hinterland, that is so heartily sick of subsisting on the crumbs that drop from Gotham's table. Livelier and livelier every month grows the expectation that the Middle West and the Far West will each be driven to go separately into the business of theatrical production on its own account—will set up two other realms of the theatre, each with its own capital, destined in time to treat with New York, and with each other, in friendly exchange, much as New York now deals with London.

Married Life.

Husbands, we may suppose, usually turn out unsatisfactorily. The charms of the lover are not perpetuated. The domestic hudget is a foe to marital harmony, and to all these factors we must add the natural desire of the male to dominate and subdue. What can we do about it?

May Edginton, dedicating her novel to a "completely successful husband," tells us all about an unsuccessful one. Oshorn Kerr and his young wife are both commonplace, painfully so, but they marry in the usual rosy dream, and then disillusion comes with babies, debts, and evenings out. The author, with an author's despotism, clears matters up toward the end, but in real life we are afraid that Mr. and Mrs. Kerr would either have resorted to divorce or would have lived together in a state of passive hostility.

Strategy.

Strategy, said Napoleon, is the art of discovering what your enemy intends to do and preventing him from doing it. If this axiom had been applied to the great war it would have brought a speedy victory to whichever of the combatants had adopted it. But all of them evaded it.

Germany went to war in order to secure the control of Asia Minor, and for nothing else. To be the master of Asia Minor is to be master of the world. Asia Minor is the strategic centre of the human race. If Germany had concentrated her efforts here she would probably have won. The Allies, on their part, should have waged a purely defensive war in the west, bringing their concentration to bear upon the Balkans. But they would have been at a disadvantage, geographically and otherwise. Germany would have saved her vast efforts at Verdun and at her great offensives, and the western lines would have been hardly more than a matter of sentries. Germany made the further mistake of trying to be a sea power. This led to the submarine war and consequently to the entrance of America and to German defeat. Both sides were fighting for possession of Asia Minor and of the Balkans, but they chose a western field to fight in, with consequent prolongation of the struggle.

There was always an "eastern" military party during the war, but it produced no more than a wavering and fluctuation of strategies. In a few years' time the strategical experts will all be "easterners." Mr. William L. McPherson, who writes this lucid account of the campaigns and battles of the war, makes this clear enough. Perhaps he is inclined to undervalue the strength of Russia, but this leaves his main point untouched, that the war should have been fought in the east and that incalculable energies were wasted by the diffusion of force and by concentration upon unprofitable objectives.

THE STRATEGY OF THE GREAT WAR. By William L. McPherson. New York: G. P. Putnam's Sons; $2.50.

The Cruise of the "Scandal."

This volume contains fifteen short stories by Mr. Victor Bridges, written, he says, not for artistic expression, but for food and drink. Let us hope that they will be as productive of nutriment as he desires, with the understanding that the drink section shall be of the uninebriating American variety. For they are good stories, neither psychological nor sensational, but of the wholesome human and humorous variety.

THE CRUISE OF THE "SCANDAL" AND OTHER STORIES. By Victor Bridges. New York: G. P. Putnam's Sons.

The Margaret Book.

This story is supposed to be told by Peter, a soldier who has been invalided from France and who stays with Margaret and her family in Dorsetshire. Peter, like Silas Wegg, has a habit of dropping into verse, a habit that we can only describe as unfortunate. Not that it is wholly bad verse, but when at least one-half of a novel is thus constructed the general effect is tiresome.

THE MARGARET BOOK. By Alfred Clark. New York: John Lane Company.

Briefer Reviews.

Florence Irwin, author of "Master-Auction" (G. P. Putnam's Sons; $1.75), says that her book is not for those who do not play auction nor for those who are content with what they already know. It is for those who wish to keep pace with the latest skill and the latest discussions.

The Thomas Y. Crowell Company has published a new and amended edition of the "Handbook of American Government," by William H. Bartlett. The revision has been done by Henry Campbell Black, who thus gives us a quick guide-book to all the functions of American government and the state documents which stand behind it.

The latest story by Eleanor H. Porter is entitled "Mary Marie," who is the daughter of an austere father who wanted to name his daughter Mary and of a somewhat flighty mother who preferred Marie. The publisher, the Houghton Mifflin Company, offers substantial prizes for the best eight-line verse characterizing Mrs. Porter's heroine. The price of the book is $1.90.

Sir Robert Baden-Powell is the author of a book entitled "Scoutmastership" and described as a handbook for scoutmasters on the theory of scout training. In the preface to this American edition he says: "Conditions may differ, temperaments are not all alike, national characteristics may vary, but for all that I find that, go where you will, the boy is the same animal, bless him." The book is published by G. P. Putnam's Sons ($1.50).

Among recent vocational hooks is "The Man of Tomorrow," by Claude Richards. After preliminary chapters on "The Importance of Specializing," "The Need of a Broad Foundation," and "Choosing a Vocation," the author passes on to a study of the vocations themselves, and discusses callings and trades from agriculture to the fine arts, pointing out the strong features of each and a boy's chance of success therein. The book is published by the Thomas Y. Crowell Company.

Gossip of Books and Authors.

New York will shortly add another to its list of distinguished English visitors of this year. W. L. George, the young English realist, is coming to America next month in connection with the publication of his new novel, which will be brought out by the Harpers, and to make a lecture tour of the United States. Mr. George worded his purpose somewhat differently in a recent interview, apropos of the rumored anti-American feeling in England. "I have not come across it myself," he said, "except in so far as every nation thinks itself better than other nations, and likes to suggest to the traveler that he's very fortunate in being let in at all. It's the same thing all over the world."

The publishing house of D. Appleton & Co. certainly scored an enviable "scoop" when immediately on the death of the Empress Eugénie they announced the publication of her memoirs. The firm have had the manuscript for the last ten years, but because of the personal revelations contained in the book, Eugénie requested that it be withheld from the public until her death.

E. Alexander Powell has just been awarded the Legion of Honor by the French government in helping the public know the truth about the war. This is the third decoration Mr. Powell has received for his merit as correspondent. Previously he was decorated by Italy and Montenegro.

One genius seldom has time or inclination to write of another. Maxim Gorki is an exception to this. In his "Reminiscences of Tolstoy," now appearing serially in the Freeman and to be brought out in book form by B. W. Huebsch, Inc., in the fall, conversations and incidents that occurred at the Tolstoy estate at Gaspar in the Crimea are told with such vividness as to throw light on some of the most obscure sayings of the great Russian. "Knowing our fatal fondness for mysticism which comes from the Oriental in our blood, he wished to die as a martyr in order to give his doctrines greater weight."

Among the many arrivals on the Olympic on July 28th none will find more friends among book lovers and play-goers in the country than Major Ian Hay Beith. He is, he says, hard at work on a new novel, and that it will be a good one the readers of "Happy-Go-Lucky," "A Knight on Wheels," and "A Man's Man" all feel confident.

"SMILIN' THROUGH"

We ought to feel properly grateful when they bring out here during these expensive times, not only a first-class New York play, but a first-class New York company. And at the top of the company is Jane Cowl, a first-class New York favorite, reinforced by the presence of her invariable New York leading man, Mr. Orme Caldara.

"Smilin' Through" is a fantasy in a prologue and three acts, and there are ghosts in it of beautiful dead youth brought to life again. But although the play is full of sweet and wistful sentiment, it is full of laughter, too. And few there are among the leading actresses of the day who can more prettily express the high spirits of youth, a loveliness of heart, and an incorrigible tendency to throw off witticisms of Irish flavor in a bewitching Irish brogue than Jane Cowl. This actress has all the charm needed to convey to us the sweet essence of Moonyeen, the young bride, dead fifty years before the play opens, and of Kathleen, child of her merry sister, whose bright youth, whose gay sallies, and whose tender affection gild the declining days of the two old hachelors, neighbors and chums of fifty years standing and white-haired adorners of Kathleen. The story is sad, and sweet, and strange; and blithe, and gay, and full of the laughter that helps so much to make life sweet.

And as a setting to this sweet old story of constancy and a life-long sorrow and sternness toward an unforgiven wrong is a sweet old house set in a sweet old garden. A lovely composition it is, naturally, since Joseph Urban is the creator of it. All the action of the play transpires in the flowery garden, bursting with bloom, which is a setting for the lovely cottage; a gentleman's cottage such as we read of in English novels; a beautiful home cottage with broad, small-paned windows, a slender, soaring chimney that is a thing of beauty, and a bower of trees, lovely, thick-foliaged trees that, in the background of the picture, are a balanced setting to the gay, blooming garden in the foreground.

When the play opens in the prologue two loving ghosts, wandering from their presumable paradise to the old, beloved spot where their children with love and laughter make the place bright with living youth, peep through a narrow rift which their love had made possible; a rift through which the shadowy dead can gaze and see the forms of those they had loved in life. Thus does the writer of the play strike his keynote; which is that death is merely a painless transmutation; a mere turn in the road, leading to a happy ahode from whence the dead, still cherishing their affection for the living, may stray at times and gaze with wistful longing on those earthly beings around whom their affections are still permitted to cling.

The story is told so charmingly by the author, and acted so sympathetically by the company, and there is such a beautiful atmosphere of old-fashioned romance, the romance that we all loved before we grew sophisticated and expert in passing on the sexual drama and problem plays, that it makes us feel—even if we have no real right to—young, and sweetly sad, and tenderly gay, and indulgent toward this poor, pathetic human passion for carrying our loves, and our joys, and all of our complicated selves into the life beyond the grave. Yes, even our cares, for in these Peter Ihhetson, Peter Grimm, Blue Bird plays those constant ones in the paradise of the just made perfect can not emancipate themselves from a tender solicitude for the welfare of the loved beings who have survived them.

Do not imagine, by the way, that there is a mortuary atmosphere about the play. Far from it. Those wistful gazers from the shadows of the Beyond are on the stage but a few moments, and when another visitant comes, in a later phase of the play, she comes all gleaming in the mysterious moonlight with youth and beauty and with a tender invitation to the long constant lover of her youth to make that painless entry across the threshold leading to their reunion in a far yet near country which is death.

Thus the idea of death is offered as a beautiful possibility, and old John Carteret, the "Uncle John" to Kathleen, lives, like Peter Ihhetson, in the daily hope of seeing the shape of the one and ever beloved in his waking dreams. And finally, when we see the dream dreamed visibly to our own perceptions, romance, imagination, the sympathy that the world feels even when the world can not quite believe in this reunion after death, all seem to be gently brushed by the caressing wings of passing angels.

There is a device first used in "On Trial," and since then repeated a number of times, which is used to tell some tale of the past bearing on the present by action instead of by narration. This device also is used in "Smilin' Through," so that all the actors in a past and gone tragedy, some of them dead, some of them still living but old and gray, are brought before us visibly, and the happy and finally tragic events of one night are played out before our eyes. In this effect, also, the author, the producer, and the company between them have contrived a triumph of atmosphere; that sort of atmosphere accomplished by Du Maurier in "Peter Ihhetson," when Gogo "dreamed true" and found himself hack again in the blissful, tenderly idealized past.

And, by the way, since "Peter Ihhetson" is being spoken of, why not pause here and make a complaint about San Francisco never having seen this play which ran so long in New York? Although "Peter Ihhetson" was not so widely read as "Trilhy," it was Du Maurier's most beautiful story. Both of the stories are full of that same regretful, reminiscent tenderness for a past that Du Maurier had known and deeply loved. Real memories are intertwined with his delightful description of Gogo's childhood in Passy. And when this story, with varied aspects of hot youth and expiatory old age, of romance and fantasy and tragedy, was dramatized the work was well done. A fine company of accomplished, sympathetic players won a long run for the play, but we in San Francisco were never allowed the opportunity to see it.

Judging from the eagerness with which people are flocking to the Curran to see "Smilin' Through" they would as eagerly seek the privilege of seeing "Peter Ihhetson." The play has retired now, and probably that means that we'll never have the opportunity. Ah, what quantities of first-class plays are shelved in New York, and we out here licking expectant chops in vain! It is wheels within wheels. All kinds of motives influence theatrical managers in their estimate of expenses, and I suppose that the trouble with "Peter Ihhetson" was that it would require too large and expensive a company for an across-the-continent transit.

The company that is playing in "Smilin' Through" is first-class timber. We are lucky indeed. Jane Cowl has youth, beauty, charm, a full contralto voice, and magnetism. She uses wit and humor as if they were her natal friends. She can be tender, and playful, and yearning, and sad. In fine she fits into the part to a nicety and is at once sweetly old-fashioned in sentiment and blithely modern in mood.

Mr. Orme Caldara in his dual rôle exhibits the headlong, desperate unreason of one man and the fine, serene manliness of another, and differentiates the two so that the widely divergent individualities of the two kinsmen are clearly indicated.

Mr. Ethelbert D. Halles, as Kathleen's irascible but most loving uncle, gives an excellent portraiture of the kind of old man to whose wife, if he had one, he would always be her most loved, most indulged little boy. With this portraiture was blended that of Mr. David Torrence's of the doctor, and the wrangles of the old pair provided the kind of laughable diversion that audiences thoroughly enjoy.

Mr. Charles Hampden represented an unsuccessful suitor with neat touches of comedy, although a soft-hearted author allowed him a final interview and a state of mind that won for him sympathy and favor, more especially as the actor is a fine, well-set-up young man with an ingratiating English accent.

Miss Elaine Innescott was pretty, sprightly, and physically imposing in her crinoline of fifty years ago, and Miss Augusta Haviland gave a pleasant picture of the sterling old, indulged family retainer who has passed away with the Victorian era, but who made life pleasanter while the type lasted. These, with Miss Laine Brownell as one of the disembodied spirits in the opening scene, made up an excellent group of players.

The author, an Englishman, I believe, named Allan Langdon Martin, is fortunate that the very considerable amount of sensibility that characterizes his play does not show a tendency to degenerate into mere sentimentality. His gift lies in evolving romance and in idealizing youth, age, affection, emotion, love. Recognizing this quality in the play, the Selwyns (producers) have given it a most beautiful dress, and have had the good judgment to select sterling players for the lesser, as well as for the more important rôles.

JOSEPHINE HART PHELPS.

The Dismal Swamp.

The name Dismal Swamp is a hy-word everywhere, and a legend has grown up around it of a dreary, hoggish, unknown region of snakes and dark, damp thickets, where runaway slaves fled for refuge. This region is but little better known today than it was when George Washington himself laid out a route through it.

The swamp is old historically. The first settlers at Norfolk and the region round about knew of it as a wild, impassable bit of country full of game and of valuable timber—cypress, so good for making shingles; juniper, black gum, and heech. In 1728 Colonel Byrd, while trying to establish the boundary line between Virginia and North Carolina, ran a survey across it, working with the greatest difficulty and making only a mile a day through the thick growth. He it was who named it the Dismal Swamp.

Later surveys and government maps show that the wilderness contains about 800 square miles of wood and water lying in a tract twenty miles wide and forty-five long, and extending twenty miles into Virginia and twenty-five into North Carolina. The soil is a sort of rich black vegetable mould, dry and caky at some seasons, and saturated with water at others.

The whole region is like a huge sponge, alternately dry and wet, and as the swamp level, curiously enough, is twenty feet above tide-water, it is the source of many rivers and streams.

There are deer in the woods, but it is the wild cattle that give the best sport. The ancestors of these "reed-fed" cattle, as they are called, strayed in from the fields and took up their ahode in the swamp. The result is a race of small, active, wild cattle, the flesh of which is a delicious combination of the qualities of wild game and tame animals.

There is a chance that before many years the greater part of the swamp will be re-deemed from its present wildness into civilized farm land, but it will be many years before the bear and wild cattle and moccasin snakes disappear from their refuges, and before the rare plants and birds that still draw hotanists and ornithologists from all parts of the country will be found only in museum showcases.

Over-watering the Garden

A good many domestic water bills show undue increase at this time of year.

The reason is an excess of zeal in watering the garden.

Take, for instance, the following account:

March400 cubic feet.....	$1.61
April400 " ".....	1.61
May500 " ".....	1.85
June900 " ".....	2.81
July800 " ".....	2.57

Noting the doubled delivery, our Service Department investigated, the policy being to help consumers keep their bills down to normal.

Meter and water fixtures were in first-class condition.

But the premises are in the Mission, on a street notable for well-kept little gardens.

There is, on that street, a good deal of pleasant rivalry among the amateur gardeners.

The result is that in warm weather some use more water on their lawns and flowers than is necessary or beneficial.

That was the case with the consumer whose account is given above.

Our Service Department informed him that for the best results at this particular time of year he should use not more than 3 cubic feet a month for each square yard irrigated. In his case this means 200 cubic feet of water, costing 48 cents.

That consumer has moderated his watering zeal, gets good results, and saves money.

The Columbia Theatre.

"Frivolities of 1920," the musical revue which G. M. Anderson is presenting at the Columbia Theatre, is in its fifth week in San Francisco, and judging from the crowds that are flocking to the Geary Street playhouse nightly it could remain here indefinitely.

"Frivolities" is a topical spectacle that embodies in its succession of episodes the superlatives of the scenic artist, the milliner, the modiste, and the musician.

Conspicuous in the long and imposing list of artists whom Mr. Anderson has assembled under his banner are Henry Lewis, Edward Gallagher, Joseph Rolley, Frank Davis, Delle Darnell, Richard Bold, Tom Nip, Charles O'Brien, Lelia Ricard, Dolly Best, May Keefe, the Voltaire Sisters, Ruth Craft, Will Goodall, and Edward Metcalfe. Surrounding this array is the ever-dancing "frivol chorus of fifty."

The second and final week begins Sunday night, August 8th.

Maude Fulton as author and star of "The Hummingbird" will be the next attraction at the Columbia Theatre, opening a two weeks' stay on Monday night, August 16th. It is said that Miss Fulton has been as successful both as star and author in this play as she was with "The Brat."

The Orpheum.

All the requirements of good vaudeville seem to be welded into the show which will make its appearance at the Orpheum next Sunday.

Miss Georgia Campbell will headline in her picturesque song offering, "Gone Are the Days." An old Southern mansion set in the foliage of the Mississippi River bank will be the scene. With this attractive situation Miss Campbell and her associates, Robert Buchanan, Archie Ruggles, and George Sutton, will recollect the songs of other days until a dream of the Old South will be depicted.

George Austin Moore, famous for his songs and stories, is another notable artist. Moore blends his ability as a raconteur and vocalist with good effect.

The Harry Hayden company in a romantic comedy entitled "The Love Game" will depict this international sport as it is played in real life. The cast includes Harry Hayden, Scott Moore, Eloise Murray, and Virginia Marcellinus.

Dooley and Storey, a recently formed partnership, following the close of a production, will win more honors with their "vaudeville à la carte."

Elizabeth Nelson and the Barry Boys are scheduled to produce a medley of vaudeville bits. Miss Nelson will provide the athletics, while the comedy and dance will be interpolated by the Barry Boys.

Hayataka Brothers with an exposition of athletics, Japanese style, and the Parsleys with enormous tympanies, drums, and xylophones will be other features. Frank Dobson

The Alcazar Theatre.

One big popular play release after another is packing the Alcazar, where "Fair and Warmer" gives place next Sunday to "The Crimson Alibi," the latest George Broadhurst melodrama, based upon Octavus Roy Cohen's magazine story. All the world loves a detective mystery. The New York Tribune declares that this one "completely baffles all the wise lobby guessers." Joshua Quincy, a cordially hated millionaire, is seen stricken by an unknown hand at midnight. Then through four acts suspicion wavers from one to another of a dozen suspects. The Alcazar company knows how to stage melodrama as well as comedy. The cast includes Dudley Ayres as the amateur student of criminology; Inez Ragan as the loyal lady with fighting spirit; Brady Kline, her ex-convict lover; Ben Erway, an underworld lad; Al Cunningham and Frederick Green, police officers; Henry Shumcr, an elderly scholar; Emily Pinter, a young matron; Gladys Emmons, her sister; Emelie Melville and Rafael Brunetto, the Quincy housekeeper and butler; Murray Barnard, a society wastrel, and Stella Warfield, the proprietress of a crooks' resort.

Another change, Sunday, August 15th, brings Jesse Lynch Williams' comedy, "Why Marry?" flashing with keen wit and brilliant epigrams, touching the divorce volcano now in perpetual state of eruption. It was in this remarkable comedy that the late Nat Goodwin was stricken at the height of the greatest triumph of his erratic career.

Antonio Scotti.

No opera singer now before the public enjoys so much popularity and distinction as Antonio Scotti, who will appear here with his grand opera organization at the Exposition Auditorium for the week beginning October 4th under the local direction of Frank W. Healy. It is therefore with peculiar pleasure that opera enthusiasts in this city will learn that Mr. Scotti is paying us another visit with his own company and with a greatly enlarged repertory and list of artists. The Scotti Grand Opera Company is already the leading traveling operatic organization of the country, for it has left all others behind by reason of the finish of its productions and the brilliant achievements of its artists, including, of course, Mr. Scotti himself.

Full particulars concerning the scale of prices, repertory, cast of characters will appear in next week's Argonaut.

Municipal Housing Construction.

Great Britain has under way comprehensive schemes of municipal housing construction. The London County Council has adopted a programme by which, within five years if possible, 29,000 new houses, lodging 150,000 people, will be built in the outskirts of London; while certain interior areas will be cleared and rebuilt, to the relief of 40,000 people now in unfit habitations. The council has bought 3000 acres at Barking, Essex, where it expects to raise a city for 120,000 people, with parks, shops, schools, churches, and factories. The City of London—the business region, which has but 14,000 resident population—also expects to help by erecting 2000 houses at Ilford. Leeds has acquired 8155 acres, on which it proposes to erect 8155 houses. The programme of the Edinburgh Corporation comprises the provision of 10,000 houses, of which 7000 are to be new houses in suburban garden cities and 3000 reconstructed dwellings on old sites. It involves, as lovers of Scott and Stevenson will lament, the clearance of many back closes and narrow streets of the Canongate, Cowgate, and High Riggs. The Sheffield, Newcastle, and Hull corporations expect to build more than 5000 houses each in the next few years.—New York Times.

The American Relief Administration European Children's Fund, as a private charitable enterprise, was organized by Herbert Hoover in order to carry on food relief among children of Central Europe after the general relief programme of the American Relief Administration came to an end through act of Congress of June 30, 1919. By the time the American Relief Administration personnel was withdrawn, efficient organizations for supplying undernourished children one nourishing meal a day each had been set up in the following countries: Austria, Czechoslovakia, Yugoslavia, Poland, Lithuania, Latvia, Estonia, Finland, Roumania, and in that small part of northwest Russia which had been freed from the Bolsheviks. More than 2,000,000 children were receiving this relief from the beginning of the programme.

It is said that a million tons of sugar are being held in Cuba for a still greater increase in price, and that American bankers are assisting the profiteering by making loans on the hoarded goods.

CURRENT VERSE.

She Is Overheard Singing.

Oh, Prue she has a patient man,
And Joan a gentle lover,
And Agatha's Arth' is a hug-the-hearth—
But my true love's a rover!

Mig her man's as good as cheese
And honest as a briar;
Sue tells her love what he's thinking of—
But my dear lad's a liar!

Oh, Sue and Prue and Agatha
Are thick with Mig and Joan—
They bite their threads and shake their heads,
And gnaw my name like a bone!

And Prue says, "Mine's patient man,
As never snaps me up;"
And Agatha, "Arth' is a hug-the-hearth,
Could live content in a cup;"

Sue's man's mind is like good jell—
All one color, and clear;
And Mig's no call to think at all
What's to come next year;

While Joan makes boast of a gentle lad,
That's troubled with that and this.
But they all would give the life they live
For a look from the man I kiss!

Cold he slants his eyes about,
And few enough's his choice—
Though he'd slip me clean for a nun or a queen,
Or a beggar with knots in her voice.

And Agatha will turn awake
When her good man sleeps sound,
And Mig and Sue and Joan and Prue
Will hear the clock strike round.

For Prue she has a patient man
As asks not when or why;
And Mig and Sue have naught to do
But peep who's passing by;

Joan is paired with a putterer
That hastes and tastes and salts;
And Agatha's Arth' is a hug-the-hearth—
But my true love is false!

Colloquy of Statues.

(Fifth Avenue, Night Before Pershing's Parade.)
Goddess, goddess, wake you or drowse you?
Horned Diana of Madison Square,
Bending your bow at the winds that house you,
Hunt you the Hyades, 'way up there?

Over my chase curves the moon-ship, waning,
Flapping the skies like a cloud-white drake;
Cellarer Mars and his stars are draining
Glories of light at her cruddled wake.

Sherman, Sherman, where are you riding?
Winds atoss in your brazen hair.
Down where the buildings are giants striding,
Where are you riding, away down there?

Ride? I would stir not for twenty stallions!
Yet, when your haggards of planets fade,
I shall march with the young battalions,
Leading the van of a long parade!

Steed of the Pentecost, what are you thinking?
Golden charger whose eyeballs glare,
Snuffing the smoke that's wive for your drinking
What are you thinking, away down there?

Musing, I wait till the tormented forces
Shake the black clouds to a crash of cheers
At the measured tread of Liberty's horses,
The iron eyes of her cannoners!

Whose is your guerdon now, bright palm-bearer
Courier of valor none gainsayeth.
For the old great cause, or a new cause fairer,
Angel of Courage and Love and Death?

Freedom's my guerdon. Her least word spoken
Is a wind to shuffle the kings to sand,
And the chains of oppression are utterly broken
When she smites men's hearts with her fiery hand!

Her old cause sleeps. To her new cause splendid
I carry my palm like a flag unfurled;
To the march that ends and is never ended—
To Freedom's drums in the blood of the world!

So it was when my Father thundered,
So shall it be until Man is grass.
Peace, old friends, for the night is Sundered,
And with morn the leaping bayonets pass!

Plants That Entertain Ants.

Among the most curious and interesting of natural phenomena are those pertaining to the mutual relationships of common organisms. Two plants, two animals, or a plant and an animal may live together for their mutual benefit. Very often one of the partners gets food for the combination, while the other receives protection. This is the arrangement that subsists between some tropical plants and certain species of ants which live and feed in their hollow stems, and in return drive away other insects that would do damage.

The name of "myrmecophily" (Greek myrmex, ant, and philos, friend) has been given by botanists to adaptations in plants whose object is to attract ants. These insects, even in the temperate zone, play an important part in the economy of nature, but this becomes quite notable in the tropics. In tropical America the so-called "leaf cutters," or "parasol" ants, are to be regarded as the most redoubtable enemies of vegetation. Besides such means of protection against these enemies as fibrous structure, disagreeable secretions, etc., it has been proved that some plants have relations with certain warlike species of ants which almost completely protect them from the "leaf cutters." This is held to be the most interesting instance of myrmecophily.

Two species of acacia are the best-known examples of this order of things. They have highly developed hollow thorns that serve as a refuge for a definite species of ferocious ants that pierce an entrance to them near the end.

But plants of this kind are not content with offering a mere asylum to their defenders. They also provide nutriment. At the ends of the leaves of these acacias we find small hodies, egg-shaped or pear-shaped, that are carefully garnered and eaten by the ants.

The Cecropias are remarkable trees, very widely distributed throughout the tropics. Their slender trunks are crowned with four leaves at the ends of the branches. A few active ants run continually along the branches and leaves, but if the tree is shaken slightly an army of ants rush out by small apertures, ready for savage assault on the intruder. This is the most terrible guardian that the tree has retained to protect it from its most formidable enemy, the "leaf cutter" ant. The defenders rarely leave their retreat, where they live on small whitish egg-shaped bodies about one-twelfth of an inch long, known as Mueller's corpuscles.

About 20,000,000 feet of lumber is used each year in making clothespins. Clothespins are made in three lengths, five, four and one-half, and four inches, but eventually, it is said, all clothespins will be made of the four-inch length, thus saving millions of feet of lumber,

VANITY FAIR.

Mr. W. L. George, writing in Harper's Magazine, suggests that good manners are largely a matter of money. He does not actually say this, but the inference is a legitimate one. There are two classes of the community—and of course Mr. George is writing of Europe—that have no manners at all, the very poor and the aristocrats. The very poor have no desire to mark their distinction from any other class, and having very little to live for they live as hard as they can. They are debarred from all but the coarser pleasures, and as a result their manners are unrestrained. The aristocrats, on the other hand, are under no necessity to mark the distinction of their class. It is obvious and acknowledged. They were born in the purple, and every one knows it, and consequently they have no use for good manners, which are a bit of a nuisance anyway. But the middle class is recruited from the ranks of the poor, and is always haunted by the fear that it may be confused with them. It can hardly mark the distinction by dress, since nowadays we all dress pretty much alike, although it does what it can in this direction. But its long suit is in manners. They are acquired with comparative ease and they are inexpensive. Moreover, they constitute a sort of inward cultural possession that can not be taken away. They produce a sense of inward equanimity greater than that conferred either by dress or religion.

A tradition of good manners has thus arisen in the middle class, and its origin is the desire to dig a visible trench between itself and the class from which it sprang. It wants to be as different as possible from the very poor, who have no incitement of their own to the cultivation of manners. This tradition of the middle class, says Mr. George, exhibits certain peculiarities which arouse unjust merriment. "For instance, I am told that in certain American circles, and I am sure in remote English circles, the use of the word 'leg' is not favored, and that it is better to say 'limb'; there really are people who do not go to bed, but who prefer to 'retire.' It sounds just like 'Cranford'; those ways are nearly dead, but their spirit is not. That spirit will die only when classes are dead. . . . So we obtain a middle-class tradition—to work hard, to save, to go to church, to paint the woodwork in colors that don't show the dirt (that's a summary, isn't it?), to have a piano and make the young ladies sing, to avoid strong drink, to send undesirable relatives abroad, to talk about the weather because it's safe. This sounds very dull, but the middle class is really good stuff; its tradition of decency, of generosity within bounds, and of justice to all classes, even to its own, all that is the pig-iron of the world out of which the spirit of the future will probably forge a finer steel."

We shall now have an opportunity to put Mr. George's theories to the test. The war has practically destroyed the old middle class and is in the way to create a new one. Large numbers of recruits have been brought up from the ranks of the very poor. We may call them profiteers if we like, and as a matter of fact there has been much more profiteering among the very poor than among the very rich. Will they acquire good manners? Will they want to forget their source and to acquire some sort of distinctiveness? It is safe to bet that they will.

A lady writing from England says that the bouleversement there is remarkable. If you see a woman clad in furs and jewelry sallying forth with a dirty face to do her shopping at 10 o'clock in the morning you may be sure that she is the wife of a day laborer. The rather skabbily dressed woman on the other side of the street may be a countess. What remains of the upper middle class have to resort to all sorts of expedients in their desperate efforts to cling to their position. They can not buy fine dresses any more, so they hire them. A regular trade has sprung up in this sort of transaction. One of these costumers says: "The cost of hiring a frock is about two guineas. A cloak comes to another guinea, and a tiara and jewels amount to another couple of guineas. So the woman who does not go out much, but who wants to look very nice on some special occasion can wear pretty things without the heavy cost of buying them."

Curiously enough, a very similar story comes from Mexico. There, too, the middle class has disappeared, as it always does in times of war. Its place has been taken, not by profiteers, but by conquerors, who have occupied the houses and annexed the property of the rightful owners. Official positions that were once filled from the middle classes are now filled from among these ex-soldiers, who are mainly drawn from the roughest parts of the community, but who are none the less behaving themselves remarkably well and showing evident signs of a desire to acquire good manners. The ambition to be in some way distinctive must evidently be counted as among the forces of civilization.

Even after five years of war struggles and eighteen months of past war worry the instinctive politeness of the average Frenchmen still survives (says a Paris dispatch to the New York Sun and Herald). This was evidenced in a small patisserie where M. Anatole France, the illustrious French author, casually drops in for his afternoon tea and cakes whenever he visits the capital. All of the tables were occupied, but the waiter recognized the visitor and with characteristically excited gesticulations insisted that M. Anatole France wait for just one minute.

Approaching two men seated at a comfortable table, the knight of the napkin, ignoring the appeals of the author, whispered to them, "May I have your table for M. Anatole France of the Académie Française?"

There was no hesitancy shown by the two Parisians. They rose, bowed to the writer, and departed. One, however, remarked to the waiter as he paid his bill:

"You are right. Here in France, from the President to the tea-room waiters, the world of letters must be honored."

American Troops in the Big War.

The United States made the third largest contribution in fighting forces during the war, namely, approximately 2,000,000 men, according to figures compiled by British statisticians. France headed the list, while Great Britain came second, with a grand total of 8,654,467.

The ration strength of the American army in France on Armistice day—that is, the total number of men who were fed from army stocks—is placed at 1,924,000, while Great Britain's ration strength in this theatre on the same date was 1,731,578. This does not take into account prisoners of war or the negro labor employed by England.

America's combatant strength in France on Armistice day is set down at 1,160,000 and Great Britain's at 1,164,790. The combatant strength includes all troops whose functions are, in the first place, fighting.

The capture of prisoners and guns in France during the victorious offensive against the German army between July 18 and November 11, 1918, is given as follows:

British armies, 200,000 and 2540, respectively; French armies, 135,720 and 1880; American armies, 43,300 and 1421; Belgian armies, 14,500 and 474. It is pointed out that in addition to the above there were 80,000 British combatant troops in Italy, who co-operated in the final defeat of the Austrian army at Vittorio-Veneto, capturing 30,000 prisoners, and that in the Eastern theatre of war, Palestine and Mesopotamia, where about 100,000 British troops, on an average, throughout 1918 were fighting, the complete defeat and destruction of the Turkish army was effected by the British alone, and a total of 85,000 prisoners taken.

Unless they cut prices on foodstuffs 10 per cent., King George notified tradesmen who cater to Buckingham Palace that he would trade somewhere else.

STORYETTES.

Grave and Gay, Epigrammatic and Otherwise.

Ossip was attempting to walk along the street on his hands. A policeman arrested him, not agreeing that the world had turned upside down. "How much did you drink?" asked the judge. "Just one glass of wine." "Well," remarked the judge, "it must have been a magnifying glass."

"Rivers," said the American, "why your rivers are nothing to ours. Compared with our Hudson and Mississippi, your Mersey, Severn, and Thames are sleepy, sickly streams." "Oh, come!" protested the Englishman, "I think your rivers are just as sickly as ours." "How do you make that out?" "Well, they are all confined to their beds," replied the visitor.

General Peyton C. March said at a dinner in Philadelphia, apropos of a military argument: "It is hard to argue with our opponents. They are more unreasonable than the lady who missed the train. 'We wouldn't have missed it,' the lady's husband growled, 'if you hadn't been so long dressing.' 'Yes,' she said, 'and if you hadn't hurried me so, we wouldn't have such a long wait now for the next.'"

To the rear door of the house of a lonely spinster in a Pennsylvania town there recently came a seedy-looking person who, after being given some food, made so bold as to proffer this additional request: "Missus, ask your husband if he aint got an old pair of trousers to give me?" Whereupon the spinster, anxious not to expose her solitude, replied: "I am sorry, my good man, but he—er—never wears such things."

Frederic Courtland Penfield, the noted diplomat and author, was discussing at a dinner in Philadelphia his campaign against profiteering tailors, when a young matron said mischievously: "Mr. Penfield, I'm astonished to see such a learned person as yourself going in for anything so frivolous as a campaign against the high cost of clothes. Clothes don't make the man." Mr. Penfield laughed. "Indeed they don't," he said. "Nowadays they break him."

He had escorted her home, and they stood together by the open door. What mattered the cold to these pulsating lovers? What mattered the icy wind that entered from the street outside and threatened to extinguish the flickering hall lamp? What, in fact, mattered anything? For their last moments had arrived, and they would not meet again for twenty-four hours. "Heart of my heart," he whispered, "how I love you!" "And how I love you," she whispered back, "light of my days, light of my thoughts, light of my very existence, light—" "Lucy," shouted her father's angry voice from above, "just put out that light at once and get to bed."

Methodists attending the North Indiana M. E. Conference in Richmond were discussing what had become of a number of the old-time ministers they had known. "When the cost of living became so high," said one of the group, "our pastor resigned, went to live on his farm and now is in the dairy business." "And I suppose," said another, "he now sells pasturized milk."

An Irishman fresh from his native country was going to a situation in Liverpool. Feeling puzzled how to secure his ticket at the railway station he suddenly decided to watch some one else obtain theirs. Presently he heard a woman in front of him ask for a ticket—"Mary Hill, single." "Be jabbers, I have it," said Pat. Boldly stepping up to secure his ticket he exclaimed, "Pat Murphy, sir, married."

Little Timothy went to visit his Aunt Elvira, a dignified and severe woman who owned a parrot. One morning, coming unexpectedly upon Timothy and the bird, she was horribly shocked to hear the little boy using some profane words. "Why, Timothy," cried the old lady, "I do believe you're trying to teach my parrot to swear." "Oh, no, I'm not, auntie," the boy replied. "I'm just telling it what it mustn't say."

The late long staple cotton crop has made quite a lot of money for South Carolina negroes. A short time ago one of them purchased a high-priced car. A few days later he went back to the salesman. "Cap, is you got any of dese here cowketchers?" he inquired. "Do you mean humpers, Charlie?" "Yassir." "Well, Charlie, do you want one for both ends of your car?" "Nawsir, cap, aint nobody gwine ter ketch up wid me. Ah jes want one fo' de front."

Apropos of the University of Pennsylvania's Assyrian tablets, exonerating Eve from all complicity in the sad business of the apple, Mrs. William Yerbert, president of the Working Girls' Vacation Society, said in New York: "So Eve didn't tempt Adam, after all? So Adam fell of his own accord? Well, I'm not surprised. It reminds me of Mr. Downe. 'Does Mr. Downe bear his misfortunes like a man?' a lady asked. 'Exactly like a man,' answered another lady. 'He blames all on his wife.'"

A Jeffersonville merchant has recently placed an automatic weighing machine in front of his store. A few days ago a citizen was observed standing on the machine and closely scrutinizing the dial. His hat was in his hand although the thermometer marked a low temperature and a passerby asked him why he had his hat off. "I want to see what I weigh without my outdoor garments," said the citizen blandly. His interlocutor walked away muttering, "He would not weigh much less if he took his head off as well."

"It is a strange thing," said the professor. "I was shaved this morning by a man who really is, I suppose, a little above being a barber. I know of my own knowledge that he studied at Heidelberg and spent several years in other foreign educational centres. I know, also, that he has contributed scientific articles to our best magazines and has numbered among his intimate friends men of the highest social standing. And yet," soliloquized the professor, "he can't shave a man decently." "By Jove," exclaimed young Rounder in astonishment. "What is he a barber for, with all those accomplishments?" "Oh, he isn't a barber," said the professor, yawning. "You see, I shaved myself this morning."

Mary's teacher one day asked her to draw a picture of Old Mother Hubbard's house, showing Old Mother Hubbard and her dog. Very quickly Mary drew the rough outlines of what was supposed to be a house, placing the crude form of Old Mother Hubbard beside the door. Then, with a self-satisfied air, she handed her finished product to the teacher. "That is very good, Mary," commented the teacher, as she looked at the drawing, "but where is the dog?" "Oh, the dog is in the house," promptly replied Mary.

A traveling man the other day was telling of one of his customers, a hardware merchant in one of the smaller places in the state, who enjoys the game of pool as a diversion after business hours. Frequently after closing his store he drops in a pool-room next door and enjoys a game or two before going home. His little daughter, who often waits on him while indulging in his pastime, one evening after going home said to her mother, "What kind of a game is that daddy plays when he takes a stick and a ball, then says, 'Oh hell?'"

Inasmuch as rats did much damage to his papers, a Hindu clerk, who was in charge of the official documents in one of the more remote Indian towns, obtained permission to keep two cats, the larger of which was to receive somewhat better rations than the other. A few weeks later the head office at Delhi received this dispatch: "I have the honor to inform you that the senior cat is absent without leave. What shall I do?" To this problem the office vouchsafed no reply. After waiting a few days the Hindu sent off a proposal: "In re absentee cat. I propose to promote the junior cat and in the meantime to take into government service a probationer cat on full rations."

THE MERRY MUSE.

To Be or Not to Be.

I'd rather be a Could Be
If I could not be an Are;
For a Could Be is a Maybe
With a chance of touching par.
I'd rather be a Has Been
Than a Might Have Been by far;
For a Might Have Been has never been,
But a Has was once an Are.
—Stanford Chaparral.

On Teaching.

When I consider how my days are spent
In teaching forty unresponsive girls
Who are too busy fondling puffs and curls
To let me on their minds e'en make a dent
Of what the ages past have to present
As food for thought, a little voice I hear
Which says to me, 'Tis quite in vain, my dear.
The present youth on present things are bent;
There is no time for thoughts of yesteryear.
Why should they learn of Roman and of Greek?
No movie plots are founded on their fate.
Why should they wish the poets' words to hear?
'T'll say so' are the words they need to speak.
To get response you must be up to date."
—Emily H. Welch in Life.

Truth and Fiction.

I saw the posters in a row that advertised a movie show. The characters were far from slow, With guns and ropes and knives. Their plain intentions brought dismay. They were prepared to maim or slay and possibly to run away With one another's wives.
I told myself I'd give no heed, to satisfy my mental need, to turbulence in thought or deed, But comfort I would find By sitting in an easy chair, where warmth and comfort fill the air, to read the daily page with care, And thus improve my mind.
I read of soviet and rum; of burglars bold who go and come; of prophets who are going some, Predicting troubles new. Suspicions dark I found rehearsed; old grudges vengefully were nursed. And of it all, this seemed the worst: Some of it might be true!
I tossed away the fateful page which told of reckless human rage and hid myself unto the cage Where movie tickets grow. And there I gave my kind applause to elus and dirks and gats and saws and feel quite peaceable because It's only just a show. —Washington Star.

A Practical Joke.

Premier Lloyd George has been besieged at his official residence, 10 Downing Street, by a large number of would-be housekeepers attracted there as the result of a joke with a moral perpetrated by an organization of women clerks and secretaries.

Hundreds of members of the organization have been dismissed from employment in government offices as post-war activities have ceased. They have protested vigorously through delegates who have tried unsuccessfully to interview Mr. Lloyd George. In answer to their last communication the premier had the following addressed to them:

"The prime minister says there can't be very much in this talk of women finding it hard to find employment. He has been trying for some time to get a housekeeper for No. 10, and he can't find one who wants the situation."

Dorothy Evans, secretary of the organization, immediately called several employment agencies by telephone. The proposition appealed to many applicants at the agencies, for it isn't every day that a woman gets a chance to work at the famous No. 10. Soon the austere doorman at the official residence was opening the door, not to high-hatted politicians, but to a number of women in all stations of life brought by servitude.

The doorman reported to a secretary, the secretary to the prime minister, and in a short time the secretary was on the telephone telling the agencies to call off the applicants. And the prime minister has not yet obtained a suitable housekeeper.

"Piedmont Estates" Homesites

—IN—

The East Bay's Finest Residential Park

IN BEAUTIFUL PIEDMONT, commanding a most magnificent view of San Francisco Bay and the Marin County hills.

THIS SUPERB residential Park is situated on the Sunkist slope of the Fashionable Piedmont District and is absolutely protected from disagreeable winds.

THIS PARK has been subdivided so the contours of the land give each homesite a natural setting. This will appeal to appreciative people, who desire something different from the ordinary flat level land without inspiration or artistic merit.

ONLY FIFTEEN of these remarkable homesites of from one to four acres; each one furnishing a most picturesque location for a home of dignity and refinement.

OVER ONE MILLION DOLLARS of Piedmont's finest homes adjacent to Piedmont Estates.

CAREFULLY RESTRICTED to home costing from $10,000 upward.

THIS UNIQUE LOCATION, the splendid plans prepared for the development of this beautiful residential Park, prepared by landscape Engineers of note, and the perfect building restrictions combine to make this a home place of distinctiveness and individuality.

Del Monte Notes.

DEL MONTE, CAL., August 2.—Social activities at Del Monte afford much pleasure for the many guests sojourning here. The Palm Grill overlooking the east terrace of the hotel, with view of the picturesque Roman plunge and solarium, is the favorite gathering place. Special dinner parties are numerous and afternoon tea affairs bring together the smart folk sojourning at California's best-loved resort.

Count de Limur's dinner the other evening was a delightful occasion. Among the guests were Mr. and Mrs. S. F. B. Morse, Mr. and Mrs. John F. Neville, Mr. and Mrs. Charles Blythe, Mr. and Mrs. Harry L. Scott, and Miss Katherine Ramsay. Miss Ramsay is visiting Del Monte with Mr. and Mrs. Blythe of San Francisco.

Another informal affair at Del Monte Lodge the other evening was a dinner given by Mr. and Mrs. W. H. LaBoiteaux, who with their two daughters are making Del Monte their summer home. Some of those noted at the dinner were Mr. and Mrs. Alfred Tubbs, Mr. and Mrs. Frank B. Anderson, Mr. and Mrs. E. K. Boisot, Mr. and Mrs. George W. McNear, Sr., Mr. and Mrs. Clinton E. Worden, and Mr. and Mrs. George B. Carpenter.

Mrs. Harry L. Scott, who has taken a house at Monterey for the summer, almost achieved the honor the other day of making the seventeenth hole on the Del Monte golf course in one stroke.

Mr. and Mrs. J. A. Mackenzie are spending a great deal of time in their new home, which fronts on the eleventh fairway of the Pebble Beach golf course.

Mrs. Charles Butters of Oakland, in company with Mrs. Arthur Rickard, visited Del Monte over the week-end.

Altitudes in the United States.

Slight differences in distance from the centre of the globe prove extremely important by comparison with differences in location on its surface. To look down a mile upon an object below, as one can do from the rim of the Grand Cañon of Arizona, constitutes a bewildering experience, yet that distance on the surface is of little account. One must travel north or south hundreds of miles to experience as much change in the climate as would be afforded by a few hundred feet on the vertical line.

The differences between Eastern and Western elevations in the United States are most striking. Colorado has forty peaks that are more than 14,000 feet above sea level. Mount Washington in New Hampshire and Mount Mitchell in North Carolina, the highest peaks of the Appalachian system, north and south respectively, are considerably less than half as high as this above the ocean. Several transcontinental railroads in the West pull their main line trains over a greater elevation than that reached by the cog railroad up New Hampshire's proud peak. But of course in the West these elevations are reached gradually.

Most American cities are low. Chicago is only about 600 feet above sea level and Pittsburgh but 100 feet higher. Minneapolis, near the head of the Mississippi, has an elevation of less than 1000 feet, and various parts of New Orleans, at the mouth of the river, are recorded in the government tables as having elevations of from one foot to fifty feet. St. Louis, as might be expected, lies about half way between these terminal cities. Montana is up in the air, with its leading city perched at the elevation of the highest peaks of the Adirondack Mountains of New York. In Denver there is a mark, near the State Capitol, which is just one mile above sea level. New Mexico is a tableland country.

The Germans of Chile are collecting money for the erection of a monument to Bismarck. The circular that is being sent to all Germans in Chile states that the monument is to be "in honor of the Chileans who fought for Germany, in memory of Bismarck, and a symbol of an unsubdued spirit among Germans."

Housekeeper—Did you ever go to school?
Tramp—Once upon a time I did, ma'am; just once.—Judge.

Willis—My mother made her living by the needle. Gillis—Shake. So did my old man. He was a prohibition-town dope doctor.—Outlook.

Mrs. Knicker—Have you had a husy week?
Mrs. Bocker—Rather; I've had two husbands, three landlords, and four cooks.—Sun and New York Herald.

"An actress in preparing herself for the stage reverses all the usual rules of art."
"How so?" "She paints first and draws afterward."—Baltimore American.

Kitchen Caller—The folks here live pretty high, don't they? Cook—Oh, yes, I gave them to understand they'd have to if they wanted to keep me.—Boston Transcript.

"Life is getting to be such a bore!"
"What's the matter now?" "Oh, I went shopping this afternoon and was only able to spend $500."—Pittsburgh News.

"Speakin' of the irony of fate," began Uncle Bill Bottletop. "What do you know about it?" "Quite some. This is the first spring that my little mint patch has looked like it was really goin' to amount to something."—Washington Star.

"Why, this is a funny telephone; isn't finished, is it?" "Yes; that's a complete telephone." "But there is nothing to it but the receiver. Where is the mouthpiece?" "Doesn't need one. That is the instrument over which I converse with my wife."—Puck.

"I'm going to get you another chair for the kitchen, Norah." "Sure, I don't need it, ma'am." "But you have only one." "One's enough, ma'am." "But you have company some evenings, don't you, Norah?" "Only gentlemen, mum."—Yonkers Statesman.

Mr. Black picked up his baby boy and exclaimed with fatherly pride: "There now, isn't he just the picture of his father?" Mr. Brown thought a minute, and replied: "Yes, you're right, but you don't want to let that worry you so long as he's healthy."—Boys' Life.

"You say you were held up by a handit with a revolver this morning. At what time?" "Five minutes to one." "How can you fix the time so precisely?" "Because I could see the church clock and I noticed the hands were in the same position as mine."—New York Globe.

"How did you enjoy the sermon?" "Too short." "That so? I never heard any one complain that a sermon was too brief before." "Well, you see, it was this way; I'd hardly dropped asleep before the thing was over."—Detroit Free Press.

Hub—The preacher said this morning, you'll remember, that the finest garment a woman can wear is the mantle of charity. Wife—Yes, and judging from the fuss they make over the hills, it's about the only garment some husbands want their wives to wear.—Boston Transcript.

President and Chairman.

One of the very few persons who in recent months has had relatively free access to the President is Mr. Homer Cummings, who up to some two weeks ago was chairman of the Democratic National Committee. Only week before last, and since his retirement from the committee, Mr. Cummings was admitted to the presence. In marked contrast stands the fact that the new chairman, Mr. George White, although he has been in Washington, has not been received at the White House. Failure on the part of the President to receive Mr. White is interpreted as indicating resentment of an appointment not to presidential liking. It is no secret that Mr. Wilson wished the conduct of the campaign to be left in the hands of Mr. Cummings.

Mr. White is rather closely affiliated with the anti-Wilson faction of the Democratic party—the faction under whose machinations the nomination was given to Mr. Cox. When Mr. White was in the House of Representatives in 1914 he declined in a somewhat spectacular fashion to take orders from the White House, notably in the matter of the bill for construction of a government railroad in Alaska. This bill was an Administration measure, originating under presidential direction and supported by all the resources of executive influence. White, who had spent several years in the Klondike, was resolutely opposed to the theory of government ownership in Alaska. Furthermore, Mr. White attributes his defeat for Congress in the election of 1914 to Administration influences and his second defeat in 1918 to the President's letter asking that Democrats only be elected to Congress. At the time Mr. White was running on personal popularity in a close district and he has attributed his defeat to the President.

The choice of Mr. White as chairman of the national committee is part of the Cox tactics in an endeavor to carry the pro-Wilson Democrats on one shoulder and the anti-Wilsonites on the other. It is uncertain whether he can make this policy win—if under it he will be able, in spite of other concessions, to hold the President's cordial support. Mr. Wilson is hard to please in these matters. His demand in times past has been for complete subordination to his wishes and there has been no indication of a changed attitude of mind. In truth his marked slight of Mr. White may be taken as proof that his old autocratic spirit and his attitude towards those who fail to conform to his wishes are as definite and as positive as ever. It is not likely that Chairman White will win his way to favor at the White House; and it remains to be seen in what measure the presidential disfavor may embarrass him in his job as administrator of campaign affairs.

A Plan to Bring Liberty Bonds Back to Face Value.

To the fifteen million—more or less—holders of government securities Mr. Harding's statement in his speech of acceptance that "this government should make its Liberty and Victory bonds worth all that its patriotic citizens paid in purchasing them" was truly a cheering message. Undeniably the decline in the market value of these bonds has tended vastly to discredit the government in the minds of those who were assured that in taking these securities they were not only rendering to the country a patriotic service, but were making a sound investment. The outstanding issues represent at par approximately $15,384,000,000. This is what was paid for them. Today they are saleable only at discounts aggregating approximately $1,500,000,000. This last figure is the measure of the direct loss to those—mostly persons of moderate means—who bought the bonds in good faith and upon official assurances of their stable value. It is an obvious duty of the government to make these securities good; and it is no less a duty of honor than one of what we may call moral expediency, since there is a close and natural relationship between governmental good faith and patriotic sentiment. A citizen who has paid a hundred dollars for a government pledge and who now finds that that pledge is worth only eighty-five dollars is in the way of losing something of respect and affection for the government.

There are various ways by which the blundering policy under which the Liberty and Victory issues were put forth may practically be corrected, thus restoring to investors the losses sustained through depreciation. Ex-Senator Weeks of Massachusetts has suggested the calling in of these bonds with substitution for them of a serial bond issue bearing an interest rate of $5\frac{1}{4}$ per cent., which he thinks would go immediately to par.

Comparison of costs to the government under the sinking fund method and the plan proposed by Senator Weeks has been carefully worked out. On May 31st there were outstanding as above stated approximately \$15,384,000,000 of Liberty bonds bearing interest rates from $3\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. to $4\frac{1}{4}$ per cent., maturing at dates ranging from September 15, 1928, to June 15, 1947. The redemption date for Victory notes is June 15, 1922, and the maturity date May 20, 1923, times so near at hand that the notes should be considered separately in any plan for future financing. Assuming that each issue of Liberty bonds will be retired on its maturity date, an exceedingly conservative assumption, then it will have cost the taxpayers in interest and principal from June 15, 1921, to June 15, 1947, approximately \$26,142,000,000. If Congress should enact a law refunding all these issues into a single serial issue bearing $5\frac{1}{4}$ per cent. interest finally retired on June 15, 1947, the total cost would be in round figures \$26,287,000,000.

Thus at a negligible cost the advantages of the proposed conversion would be: (1) The probable return of every Liberty bond to par and the restoration of approximately a billion and a half dollars to the wealth of the bondholders. (2) Distribution the first year among the bondholders of approximately $175,000,000 additional interest, gradually reduced from year to year as the principal is retired. (3) Certainty of the absolute extinguishment of the nation's war debt at the end of twenty-six years. It is argued that under the present system the debt would run for an indefinite period depending upon various factors, such as the discretionary use of the sinking fund by the Secretary of the Treasury and the possible refunding by Congress of portions of the debt.

Practically the only objection to the serial method is the increased first cost. It would require for the first year approximately twice the appropriation for principal and interest called for under the present plan, but with the additional reduction of the principal, in a few years the cost would be less than the sinking fund requires. Of course many details, including the tax-exemption features, would have to be worked out, but the problem is not an insoluble one. A supreme advantage in addition to advantages already indicated would be restoration to millions of owners of Liberty bonds the losses they have had to endure as the market prices of their holdings have steadily declined—this with the moral gain of reestablishing in the minds of some fifteen millions of citizens renewed confidence and respect for the government.

Cox Makes the Issue Plain.

Governor Cox's speech of acceptance, like that of Senator Harding two weeks earlier, is so long that practically nobody will read it. Sitting with a group of exceptionally intelligent men five days after Harding's acceptance, the editor of the Argonaut asked who had read it. One had done so, "rather hurriedly," he admitted. One other had read "about half of it." Two had read newspaper summaries. Seven confessed that the very sight of seven columns of closely printed matter had so discouraged them that they had "cut it out." Similarly, we suspect, it has been with Governor Cox's ten-thousand-word "drive." The Argonaut would like to wager something handsome that of the six hundred thousand and more men, women, and children in San Francisco not five hundred have read or ever will read either of these over-phrased documents. Thus in saying too much and in saying it too elaborately the purpose of the candidates has been nullified.

It is to be regretted that recent presidential candidates have not followed the example set by General Grant in 1868. In accepting the presidential nomination Grant covered all essential points in a statement of something less than five hundred words, running in printed form to about one-fourth of an ordinary newspaper column. It was read by everybody who read anything and it impressed the country as no one of these later-day pronouncements has done. A statement of such great length as to make nine hundred and ninety-nine men in a thousand—and all the women—shy at it might just as well never have been made at all.

Governor Cox mentions only inferentially the issue of prohibition, upon which the country was waiting his pronouncement with intense interest. The one issue upon which he is really explicit is that of the league of nations; and here he has shown the white feather. His position during the past year and a half, illustrated by many expressions in his newspapers and by his more or less close association with the anti-Wilson faction of his party, has been that of protest against the Wilson son's autocratic insistence upon acceptance of the league project without the dotting of an i or the crossing of a t. Now he swallows the Wilson programme boots and breeches. His mind, he would have the country believe, goes fully with that of the President. The motive in this change of front is obvious. Mr. Cox wants the support that the Administration can give him. To get it he gulps his objections, withdraws his protest, surrenders unconditionally. It is an obvious, undignified, and in final analysis a shameless surrender. Distinctly it does not tend to establish the credit of the candidate as a man of definite and consistent mind and of sound courage. Plainly he would rather be wrong than miss the chance of being President.

In Governor Cox's surrender to Mr. Wilson there is this merit, namely, it defines the real issue, the supreme issue, in this campaign. In a word that issue is Wilsonism. Of course many other things are involved in the coming election, but the essential thing is that compound of theory, policy, and practice that mark off Mr. Wilson's administration from that of all others that have preceded it. Mr. Wilson as the master of his party has determined that the campaign shall be pitched to this key. Governor Cox, despite his previous judgments and commitments, has weakly yielded. He has knocked under to the stubborn spirit that knows no yielding or compromise and which remorselessly enforces its will through command of resources that lie under the hands of the executive authorities. Here is the issue. We may at least thank Governor Cox for making it so plain that no intelligent citizen can fail to understand it.

Observations and Reflections of a Practical Man.

There is not in California a man of closer practical observation or of sounder judgment in respect of fundamental realities than B. F. Walton of Sutter County, farmer, fruit-grower, man of general affairs, and—to give him a title justified by the generousities of his career—helper of men. At the age of eighty-five Mr. Walton lacks something of the vivacity of his earlier days, but nothing of the vision, of the wisdom, of the solicitude for human welfare that have been the inspiration of a long and worthily successful life.

Mr. Walton returned last week from a visit to the home of his youth—Pennsylvania—and to the contiguous regions with which his youth was familiar. This last was but one of many journeys to the East, but it was exceptional in the sense that it was made under conditions of leisure and with the purpose of noting the changes of sixty years ago and today. It was made, too, in the spirit of philosophic seriousness attendant upon a possible last view of scenes once familiar and dear to memory.

Mr. Walton's observations and judgments are those of a man of optimistic spirit and of intensely practical mind. His methods of observation are close, his conclusions are related to facts as they exist and to fundamental principles. Nothing, notes Mr. Walton, shakes my faith in the ultimate working out of a high destiny for the American people. A people capable of the intensity of thought, of the progressive adaptability implied in mechanical progress, of the energies exhibited in a hundred spheres, will not fail in the end to sustain and to expand the forces that make for civilization. None the less I find myself saddened in respect of certain tendencies in our immediate American life. Mainly I find myself critical of a growing disrespect on the part of our people for the plain hard work that is essential to the common welfare. Especially I observe with regret and solicitude the very general disposition to abandon the soil for pursuits tending less in my judgment to the sustenance and development of character.

Proceeding to illustration, Mr. Walton noted the disposition to shunt over to alien elements certain large departments of labor, which upon one theory or another the native element appears to regard as beneath its dignities. There seems, he said, a very general feeling that labor—hand labor—is unworthy, that there is connected with it a kind of degradation and that the first effort of every youth of spirit and purpose should be to evade it. There is abroad in the land a species of mental and moral distemper under which work of secondary importance is regarded as more dignified than work of primary importance. Thus I note numbers of husky and capable men who ought to be doing real and essential work, and doing it with manly spirit and pride, frittering their time and wasting their energy in non-vital employments. The loss to society is tremendous—to the man himself it is fatal. The man who gives up the plow or the forge to stand behind a soda fountain or to tend a gasoline station appears to regard himself as having somehow advanced in the scale of life, whereas in truth he has thrown over a vital and constructive employment, a career of real service, of fundamental dignity, and of stimulative influence upon his own character to become a species of parasite, all but a drone in the social hive.

There is, continued Mr. Walton, a sound basis for pride in what we have achieved in the way of mechanical adaptation. The automobile, the farm tractor, the flying machine—not to mention the earlier achievement illustrated in our land and sea systems of transport—are vastly to the credit of the age and of the race. But when all is said and done the career of the average mechanic is one narrow in itself and narrowing in its tendencies, when compared with the labors of the soil and that directly related to the soil. When I left Pennsylvania sixty years ago industry in the modern sense had gotten a fair start, but as compared with present developments it was a day of small things; and I venture to say that the human element of Pennsylvania now—man for man—is not up to the mark of what it was. There is too much of routine, too much that is narrow, too much that is dwarfing of mind and spirit, too much of human classification for wholesome progress. The movement as it affects human character is distinctly backward. Pennsylvania as a seat of civilization, Pennsylvania regarded as men and women—these conditions and forces have lost rather than gained in the movement away from the soil and toward the factory. With a sense of pain I could not but note certain conditions too plainly indicative of a decline—I don't like to say decadence—in the spirit of the average Pennsylvanian of today as compared with the average Pennsylvanian of 1865.

If this country of ours, notes Mr. Walton, is going to sustain itself in a course of continuous progress, if we are to avoid a moral slump from which recovery will be difficult, we have got to take on a new attitude toward the realities of life, mainly toward the fundamental reality of work. We—men and women—have got to take stock of the fact that work of a productive and constructive kind is the real basis of human character and of dignity. We shall fail sadly if in breeding up the next generation we shall not impress upon it the truth that there is a nobility in work and that there is shame in avoiding work.

The best of all discipline, in the view of Mr. Walton, is to be found in productive labor, of labor that every day and every hour exercises the judgment, the skill, the hardihood of the worker. And in his opinion the best scheme of discipline is work with and upon the soil. Secondary and parasitic occupations pursued monotonously, without zest of achievement, without the stimulus found in exercise of individual judgment, are the bane of life, a waste of its opportunities, a nullification of its larger purposes. All of which is well worth thinking over.

Editorial Notes.

A long-pending diplomatic anomaly came to its conclusion last week in an official announcement by the Secretary of State that instruction had been given to the American representative at San Jose, Costa Rica, to announce the recognition by the United States of the present government of that country. It will be recalled that the long-existing government was overthrown in a regular election by Federico Tinoco in 1917. The issue in its last analysis was Germanism as opposed to Americanism. Tinoco opposed successfully the tendency on the part of the old government to become subservient to German dictation. Representations by responsible Americans living in Costa Rica, supported by the most intelligent element of the Costa Rican people, made clear to the Department of State that the weakness of Tinoco lay in his support of American interests as opposed to German interests. President Wilson declined to entertain the recommendations of his own officers in the Department of State and withheld recognition from Tinoco, whose government subsequently fell and a revolutionary government supported by the United States was installed in its place. It is remembered that the new revolutionary President in his inaugural address expressed the gratitude of his country to President Wilson for assisting in ousting the Tinoco régime. Thus ends an extraordinary chapter of Wilsonian diplomacy—a chapter marked by embittered enmity to a government friendly to the United States and an extraordinary friendliness to one subservient to inspirations from a country with which we were at war.

In its efforts to bring the strength of the army up to the standard authorized by Congress the War Department is encountering difficulties identical with those affecting private enterprise the country over. The Army Reorganization Act provides for an army not to exceed 280,000, including the Philippine scouts, and a commissioned strength of 17,698. Despite extraordinary efforts to induce enlistment, the roster now stands 187,197 enlisted men and 15,364 officers. The commissioned strength (officers) now number 8221 regular officers, 6766 emergency officers, and 377 emergency officers undergoing physical reconstruction.

The White House and its grounds are still in quarantine. The iron gates on the Pennsylvania Avenue side, closed when we entered the war, have not been reopened. The theory of safeguarding the President that warranted the closing of the grounds for the first time in our national history no longer holds good. None the less the grounds are now sacrosanct and nobody may enter save through the side gate that leads to Mr. Tumulty's office at the western extremity of the enclosure. The President on his almost daily motor rides uses the partly screened southwestern gate, his car drawing up for him under the southern portico well shielded from public observation. On his rides he is accompanied by Mrs. Wilson and Dr. Grayson. His face is that of a man who has suffered and is yet far from normal. The eyes are fixed and the lines of the face are far more sharply lined than in other days. The President's seclusion is even more marked than before the recent session of Congress. He sees few persons, and never for more than a few minutes.

The indifference of the President with respect to the machinery of government and of the men connected with it is naturally reflected in all of the great departments. During last week six of the ten members of the cabinet—namely, Secretary Houston, Attorney-General Palmer, Postmaster-General Burleson, Secretary Payne, Secretary Daniels, and Secretary Alexander—were absent from the city. Secretaries Payne and Daniels returned late in the week, but Secretary Wilson left town upon the heels of their arrival and Secretaries Colby, Baker, and Meredith are to be absent during the latter half of August. The government is being conducted by clerks, probably very capable clerks, but certainly clerks. They are not undertaking anything beyond the transaction of routine business.

All this is in marked contrast with the activity that ruled in the earlier period—the summer of 1913—of the Wilson presidency. Then the new broom was sweeping overtime. Congress was in session practically all the time. It was in sympathy with the President and was working at a prodigious rate under direction from the White House. Today an air of lassitude pervades the entire Federal establishment. A more or less sweet do-nothing atmosphere is breathed by those in office. The government not merely hesitates, it stands still. Of course a world of things urgently needs to be done. But with a President practically incompetent for the suggestion or transaction of business and with a Congress at odds with the executive authority stagnation rules. And it will continue to rule until the 4th of next March.

The brittleness of glass is due to the quick cooling of the hot substance. It is known that constant motion tends to rearrange the molecules in any substance and similar effect is observed when glass is boiled in a weak solution of salt in water and allowed to cool gradually. The toughness of the glass is increased very much and the effect of quick heating is less disastrous to it. This is easily applied to articles such as glass tubes for lighting purposes and prevents much breakage.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR.

THE "DOMINANT ISSUE."

ROCKLIN, CAL., August 4, 1920.

TO THE EDITOR—Sir: The dominant issue, the issue that now can not be denied, between the Republican and Democratic parties in this campaign is the league of nations. President Wilson has never receded officially or publicly from his demand that the United States accept the covenant as originally drawn without an additional dotting of an i or crossing of a t. The platform recently adopted by the Democratic convention in San Francisco endorsed this attitude of the President in the following words:

"We advocate the immediate ratification of the treaty without reservations which would impair its essential integrity, but do not oppose the acceptance of any reservations making clearer or more specific the obligations of the United States to the league associates."

Mr. Cox has not as yet made his official speech in acceptance of the Democratic nomination, but on July 18th, after a conference with the President, at which his running mate, Mr. Roosevelt, was present, Mr. Cox stated that:

"We [the President and the nominee] are agreed as to the meaning and sufficiency of the Democratic platform and the duty of the party in the face of the threatened bad faith to the world in the name of America. * * * What he [the President] promised I shall, if elected, endeavor with all my strength to give."

That brings the record to date and leaves the issue between the parties clear-cut and unshrouded. The Democratic party demands acceptance of the league of nations, virtually in the form in which it came from Versailles.

The Republican party will accept the league if the interests of the United States are safeguarded beyond a peradventure or a doubt, but otherwise refuses to stake the future and political freedom of America on an unknown and untried experiment in altruistic internationalism. Today practically all of the nations of the earth, both great and small, are members of the league save only the United States, China, Russia, and Germany, which as yet can not join.

With virtually every nation eligible to membership (save only the United States) subscribing to the covenant the league has not alone been unable to accomplish anything of good, but so far it has been both indirectly and directly productive of evil. It has proven unable to either prevent or stop war. In the case of Poland it has been criminally responsible for war. Poland's aggressive campaign against Russia that failed could only have been undertaken with the consent, either tacit or direct, of the league. This consent involved the sacrifice of one of the great principles upon which the league itself was founded; the principle of the self-determination of nations.

Despite the failure of the league, the Democratic party, apparently at the dictation and as the mouthpiece of Europe, insists that none of these things would have happened had we been members of the league and that they will and never can happen again if we but subscribe to the covenant. Democrats go even further and insist that we are in honor bound to join because the President signed the covenant.

The President possessed no power to commit the United States at Versailles to anything. He possessed it neither legally under the Constitution nor morally as representing a majority of his countrymen. Our government is based on the theory that the majority rules. In October of 1918 the President made an extraordinary personal appeal that Democratic majorities be returned to both the Senate and House, as approval of his conduct of the war and to uphold his hands in the peace negotiations. Mr. Wilson was deprived of even the moral support of representing a majority in Europe, for in both Senate and House the Democratic control was overthrown.

All eligible nations, save only ourselves, now belong to the league. If under these conditions the league can not function without and can function with us, it follows that the United States must possess something that the rest of the world hasn't and wants. Whatever that something is, its value is so great that we'd better hang on to it. The United States is no "Indian giver," and before we make this gift blindly, as the Democratic party insists, we'd better find out what it really consists of, lest we wake up some fine morning to find that we have played irrevocable ducks and drakes with both our political freedom and economic future.

Our Timber Supply.

SAN FRANCISCO, July 31, 1920.

TO THE EDITOR—Sir: At the bottom of first column Page 67 of your issue of July 31, 1920, there appears the following news item to which I wish to take exception:

"Three-fifths of the original timber of the United States has been used and this country is now using timber four times as rapidly as it is being grown. There are only two billion two hundred million feet of timber left standing in the entire country."

Most all of the papers, magazines, and periodicals published in the United States have at some time in the course of their existence made wild and ridiculous statements about the stand of timber in the United States and about the lumber industry in general and now the heretofore fair and conservative Argonaut has accepted and published some of this humbug.

Such rot given to the public by such eminent theorists as Gifford Pinchot and others has caused the lumber industry the needless expenditure of vast sums of money, to say nothing of the worry and trouble caused the individual lumberman and the consequent damage to a worthy industry.

A proper understanding of the lumber industry and the exercise of a fair and sane forestry policy will insure a perpetual supply of timber. The annual consumption of timber in the United States amounts to over forty billion feet, of which the State of Washington produces about four and one-half billion feet, and has a supply of standing timber which will enable that state to be a factor in the industry for many years. No lumberman objects to a policy of conservation which will conserve and at the same time be fair and just, but as long as the public is kept in a continual state of uneasiness through the publication of such erroneous statements as referred to above, it is hard to arrive at a mutual understanding and adjustment of a real forestry policy.

Yours very truly, R. T. BUZARD.

It is a curious fact that grains ripen earlier in Norway than in the south of Europe, an advantage due to the long days and short nights of the summer in the north.

THE TROUBLE WITH POLAND.

With every one talking about the end of the war and the duties of reconstruction, can you explain the fact that the war is not at an end, that the Poles and the Russians are at it as merrily as ever, and that the clouds seem to grow all the time thicker? What are they fighting about? No one seems to know. Do you? If so, will you enlighten the ignorance of those who now sit in darkness? Their name is legion.

Thus writes a correspondent of the Argonaut, reflecting the general perplexity engendered by the continued fighting on the old eastern front. The question is easy to answer in one sense, difficult to answer in another. It involves the whole tragedy of Poland, and the three partitions that eventually obliterated the nation. The present war is the immediate result of the incapacities of the peace conference. From a wider point of view it is the result of centuries of iniquity, of a ruthless contempt for human rights, of national greed and avarices that have now found a part of their nemesis in the great war. The remainder will follow in due course.

To put the answer in its simplest terms, it may be said that Poland is fighting for two objects. The first is to gain possession of a strip of territory to the eastward of the frontier marked by the peace conference. This strip of territory runs north and south, and it is about three hundred miles wide. It was allotted to Russia, but it was claimed by the Poles as forming a portion of their old domain, and as being strategically essential to their self-defense. If Poland is to be a buffer state between Russia and Germany, then it must be a strong Poland and not a weak one. It must be able to maintain its frontiers, and therefore its frontiers must be strong from the military point of view. Poland complains that not only has she been denied possession of a strip of land that indisputably belongs to her, but that her new frontier is one that can not be defended. Failing to move the peace conference, or indeed to secure its attention, she took the law into her own hands and moved her armies eastward.

The second of the two causes for war is in connection with the Ukraine. The Ukraine comprises all the lands that stretch from the Pripiet River to the Dnieper, a short distance below Kiev. Its people are Cossacks and they have always been free people, refusing to fight either for Russia or for Poland unless they approved of the quarrel. In the early days they belonged to the Kingdom of Poland, but their numbers were constantly augmented by Polish and Russian refugees who had fled from their own country to avoid persecution. But the Poles misgoverned the Ukraine. They resented the independence of the Cossacks, and even made war against them, with the result that the Ukraine was eventually attached to Russia. None the less it must be remembered that there is a strong affinity between the Poles and the Ukrainians. Large numbers of Ukrainians are to be found in Poland, and particularly in Galicia, and large numbers of Poles are to be found in the Ukraine. For the same reason there has always been a certain antipathy between the Russians and the Ukrainians. It was Bismarck's policy to increase this enmity in order that he might weaken Russia, and to this end he persuaded Austria to treat the Ukrainians of Galicia with great moderation in order that the Ukraine itself might be drawn into the net of Teutonic sympathies.

This antipathy to Russia showed itself by the declaration of Ukrainian independence after the Russian revolution. Now the Bolshevik government has always expressed its assent to Ukrainian autonomy, but none the less it has sought to dominate the country, with the result that there was war between the Ukraine and Russia. Now Poland could not possibly remain indifferent to such a war. The bond between Poland and the Ukraine was too strong for that. Moreover, Poland maintained—as in the case of the strip of north and south territory already mentioned—that she could not preserve an independence essential to the safety of Europe with Bolshevik Russia in control of the Ukraine and imposing a Soviet government upon a neighbor who was so much of her own life and blood. Thus we find Poland waging two wars against Bolshevik Russia for the maintenance of her independence, one for the rectification of her eastern frontier and the other for the independence of the Ukraine. Whether the rectification of her eastern frontier is actually necessary for her defense must be left for the determination of military experts, but it may be said that the Polish contention seems to be justified even to the eye of the layman. The frontier claimed by Poland is immeasurably stronger than the one allotted to her by the peace conference. It seems equally clear that the Ukraine is not only entitled to her independence, but that there can be no continuing Polish autonomy without that independence.

Now to speak of the present war as due to Polish imperialism is merely childish. There is no matter of imperialism at all. It is a matter of self-defense. Why should Poland be blamed for overriding the orders of the peace conference? Are we to assume that the earth and the fulness thereof belonged to the peace conference, that three or four men—and most curiously ignorant and incompetent men—had the right to loose or to bind all the peoples of the world according to the whim of the moment or in the light of some postprandial happy thought? Poland was not represented at the peace conference. Certainly Russia was not represented there when her garment was being portioned and lots cast for her raiment. By what rule of international law or usage was Poland required humbly to obey the bidding of three or four alleged statesmen who had only the vaguest ideas of the geographical position of Poland and no idea whatever with regard to her history? By what curious obliquity do we charge imperialism against a nation asking to do no more than achieve the object of its re-creation and for the power to defend itself against enemies who had already marked it for destruction? Are we actually so credulous as to believe that Bolshevik Russia would have allowed Poland to live in peace, no matter what she had done? Have we yet learned nothing of Bolshevik ambitions and Bolshevik methods that we can not see that the crushing of Poland was inevitable, and that some way would have been found, some provocation invented, some aggression fabricated, in order that Bolshevik armies might bring the contagion of their presence to the German frontier?

All these things must be dawning even upon the mud-diest mind. Certainly they are dawning upon the statesmen of Europe. Some of our own mean little newspapers, eager for Bolshevik and pacifist pennies, may continue to bleat about allowing Russia to work out her own salvation and to adopt the form of government most pleasing to her—we all know the formulas—but the man in the street is beginning to understand the situation. The question is no longer whether we shall allow Russia to work out her salvation, but whether Russia will allow us to work out our salvation. In a very real sense we seem to have caught the bear by the tail and now we can neither hold on nor let go. That the Russian armies are driving the Poles back upon Warsaw, that they are overrunning Poland, must not be regarded as their chief aim. It is incidental to a larger aim. Russia is making war, not upon the Poles, but upon Europe. Moreover, she does not dare to call home her armies. They are living upon the country, but if they were brought back they must be employed and fed. And returning armies are always dangerous to a country in revolution.

And so here is the point that we have to remember and that supplies us with the solution of the whole problem. Russia is making war, not upon the Poles, but upon Europe. She is advancing across Poland, not that she may overcome a Polish invasion, but that she may reach the German frontier. She would have invaded Poland in any event just as she invaded the Ukraine. Poland gave her a pretext, but she would have found a pretext for herself. She professes her readiness to enter into negotiations with England and France, her eagerness to secure a resumption of trade—but her armies move steadily forward. She agrees to the Polish proposition of an armistice—but in the meantime her armies advance. Another armistice discussion has now been agreed upon—but Warsaw is under bombardment, or nearly so. Russian cavalry is on the German frontier and the main Russian forces are not far away. No wonder we should be allowed to read the sinister report that Lloyd George and Millerand are concerting plans for the defense of western Europe. And well they may. The fate of western Europe hangs upon the defense of Poland. Poland was re-created as a barrier to Bolshevism, but with a heedful eye that the barrier should be built upon the sand. A frontier was drawn that could not be defended and it was left open at its upper end in order that it should not be a barrier at all, but rather a naked fraud, a semblance and a pretense. If Lenin had dominated the peace conference—as perhaps he did—he could have done nothing more conducive, more subservient, to Bolshevik aims. From the moment when President Wilson sent Mr. Bullitt and Mr. Steffens to plead for peace with Lenin the Bolsheviks have advanced from triumph to triumph. And the end is not yet. In the meantime we may note that it is now western Europe that must be defended.

The Russians say that they will give Poland a better frontier than the one allotted to her by the peace conference. Perhaps they will—when they have once established a Soviet government in Poland, which is the only object of their advance. Note the terms of the Bolshevik reply to the British ultimatum of July 12th. We are told that "Soviet Russia is willing in general as to the peace conditions with Poland to meet the wishes and interests of the Polish people the more fully the Polish people in its internal life enters upon the path creating a solid basis for really fraternal relations between the laboring masses of Poland, Russia, the Ukraine, White Russia, and Lithuania." There we have it in all its naked simplicity. Let Poland become Bolshevik and she may expect easy terms. Let her refuse to become Bolshevik and fire and the sword shall be her portion. This would have been her alternative in any event. If she had wrapped herself in the white robe of pacifism it would have saved her nothing. Bolshevism must go forward or it must cease to be. It can not stand still. The Polish movement eastward gave to it the desired pretext, but it was not an indispensable pretext. The placing of the blame upon Poland is no more than an excuse for inaction and political cowardice. And so now it has become a matter of the defense of western Europe.

But the Bolshevik advance is not a matter only of Poland. Would that it were. Sometimes the truth will come out, even in a daily newspaper. On August 2d we have two bulletins of the Associated Press. The first of the two says that "the Russian Soviet government has invited Djemal Pasha, former Turkish leader in Syria, to come to Russia and take over the command of the Mussulman divisions of the Soviet forces, according to a special dispatch from Bucharest to the Lokal-Anzeiger. The Soviet authorities are said to have recognized the Indian revolutionary committee as the legal government of India and to have granted it a loan of 1,000,000 gold rubles. Revolutionary committees in Turkey, Persia, and China also are receiving liberal financial support. The Russian fleet on the Caspian Sea has been reinforced, says the report, and concentration of troops on the Persian and Afghan borders is continuing." There we have Bolshevism reaching down into India, Turkey, Persia, China, and Afghanistan. The second of the two bulletins tells us that the Bolshevik penetration of Armenia is continuing and that the two provinces of Karabagh and Zangezur have established Soviet governments. We are further told that the Persian minister at Constantinople is about to go to Moscow in order to persuade the Bolsheviks to evacuate Persia. He must be a sanguine person.

But to return to eastern Europe and Poland. From the collection and juxtaposition of a few scattered bulletins we may form some idea of what may be called the underground situation. First we have a kind of appeal from General von Ludendorff. He says that Germany is practically under attack from Russia and that she can not defend herself unless she is allowed to raise an army. Now that is obviously true. Next we have a bulletin to the effect that Lloyd George has quarreled with Winston Churchill because Churchill believes that there is no hope for western Europe unless the Germans are allowed to stop the Bolshevik flood at their own frontier. Lloyd George will listen to no proposals for a German army. Now we can hardly blame Lloyd George, but then, on the other hand, neither can we blame Winston Churchill. Which would be the worse of the two evils—a German army in Germany or a Bolshevik army in Germany? There's the rub. A German army might misbehave itself. A Bolshevik army would certainly do so. Germany might take advantage of her army to enter into a military alliance with Russia, and then, in very truth, the fat would be in the fire. It is rather a nice balance of possibilities, but the weight of reason seems to be with Mr. Churchill. Lastly we have a pronouncement by Count Ernest Reventlow, whose name became so familiar during the war. He is a good deal of a fire-eater, is Count Reventlow, but none the less a man of influence and understanding. Count Reventlow says that there should be an immediate alliance between Germany and Russia. He does not believe that Russia would try to impose a Soviet government upon Germany, and particularly if Germany should now show herself willing to be friends. Reventlow has his own pleasant and peculiarly German little programme. Let the Russian government employ its army in an attack upon Roumania. He says: "A great Balkan campaign would open up a splendid perspective and would throw the Entente into a hopeless embarrassment, while Russia could derive increasing benefit from the alliance with Germany." Perhaps the count is a little indiscreet in thus saying his prayers in public, as it were, and particularly at a time when his friends are pleading for a larger German army. This army, he says, would then ally herself with Russia. But Count Reventlow is not the German government, and governments are always inclined to be conservative and they have a rooted objection to be ousted. And so there are the pros and cons and it is not easy to judge their merits. But it is quite easy to understand the Bolshevik policies, at least in their broader sense, and the main policy of them all and the one that is manifestly succeeding is to establish Bolshevism throughout Europe and Asia. What would not the world now give for a single statesman whose mind does not pivot upon the ballot-box? Unfortunately there is none in sight.

SIDNEY CORYN.

SAN FRANCISCO, August 11, 1920.

Word comes from the Department of the Interior at Washington that the American Indians are increasing in number, in intelligence, in the knowledge of how to get well and keep well, and in sanitary ways of living. Indian women are becoming better housekeepers and better mothers, and three-fourths of the Indian children eligible for school attendance are in school.

The Freemasons of London are considering plans to build the Temple of Solomon at Jerusalem in commemoration of the expulsion of the Turks.

INDIVIDUALITIES.

Thomas Hardy, the novelist, is eighty, and still a vogue.

The Queen of the Belgians is a clever playwright and has written several stories which are popular in Europe.

Otokar Sevcik, who disputes with Leopold Auer the reputation of being the world's greatest violin teacher, has followed his rival's example in making America his future home. He will be connected with the Ithaca Conservatory of Music. Among the most prominent of his pupils are Kubelik, Kocian, Zimbalist, Ondricek, Culbertson, Marie Hall, Eleanor Jackson.

William McFee, author, seaman, and chief engineer of the fruit steamer Turrialba, is to wed Mlle. Pauline Kondoff. Mlle. Kondoff is a Bulgarian, but looks very much like a Parisian, for she is small and slight, with red gold hair, olive skin, and deep brown eyes that show every nuance of thought. She was born in Saloniki twenty-six years ago. Because of an Italian grandmother she has always had a fondness for the Italian language, and part of her education was received in Italy. She speaks seven languages—English is not one of them. But as Mr. McFee speaks French fluently this language has always been her medium of conversation with her fiancé.

Governor James Cox in the manner of dress is neat and conservative. He wears sack coats and colored shirts and ties. He smokes a pipe most of the time, but cigars when the pipe is not at hand. His nose-glasses, which he always wears, even in his pictures, have no rims to them. He violates the customary rule and parts his hair on the right side. His hair is rather dark and his complexion is clear, with the suggestion of a tan, gained from golf and horseback riding, which are his means of exercise. When there is time Governor Cox goes hunting in the north woods of Michigan or in Kentucky. He usually takes one of his two boys along and they rough it for a week or two, building a shelter in the open and cooking their own meals over a campfire. Of this ability to cook Cox is particularly proud, and even on large parties he demands the right to be the chef.

The name of Harris occurs rather frequently in theatrical circles, and even those who follow the stage closely are sometimes confused. This, then, is to identify several of the different Harrises, and particularly William, Jr. Mr. Harris belongs to an old theatrical family. His father was William Harris, an important theatre owner in relatively early days. He was interested with Klaw & Erlanger and Charles Frohman in houses in New York, Boston, and Chicago, and when Mr. Frohman began to produce plays he was sometimes a silent partner. He was chiefly interested in theatres, however, and his estate is still concerned with some of those left by him. This elder Harris had two sons, Henry B. and William, Jr. Henry B., considerably the older, went into the theatre early, but, unlike his father, devoted his time largely to production. He became, in fact, one of the country's most active producers, some of his successes being "The Lion and the Mouse," "The Third Degree," and "The Chorus Lady." Among the stars who came out under his direction were Elsie Ferguson, Helen Ware, and Rose Stahl.

With about $20,000,000 available to improve the music of the United States, the Juilliard Musical Foundation of New York has started its activities by selecting the Rev. Eugene Allen Noble, LL. D., L. H. D., to be executive secretary of the Foundation. Dr. Noble's qualifications begin with his natural musical talents, which were manifested from his early boyhood in Brooklyn. An uncle was for years a cathedral organist in England. His musical bent followed him to college. Through four years at Wesleyan University at Middletown, Connecticut, he sang tenor in the North Congregational Church of Middletown, and thereby paid his college expenses. He literally sang his way through college, where he graduated with high honors in 1891, winning distinction and the Phi Beta Kappa key. During his junior and senior years he was leader of the Wesleyan Glee Club, and it is interesting to know that on a certain tour which took in the Chautauqua circuit Dr. Noble was a tenor soloist and leader of a double male quartet in which one of the second basses was Frederick Morgan Davenport, now state senator from Oneida County, New York. Although he studied theology and early became pastor in Brooklyn, Dr. Noble has been chiefly active as an educator. He has been president of two colleges and has spent the major part of his time since he was graduated from college at teaching.

Miss Mary Lemery, who is a member of the Flathead tribe of Montana, has the honor and distinction of being the first Indian woman in the history of the country to be made president of the Tribal Council. She has held this exalted position of authority for four years. There are almost 3000 members of her tribe. With due ceremony the leading men of the Flatheads conferred the eagle feather upon Miss Lemery, which is their solemn manner of manifesting unlimited trust and esteem. In addition to superintending the business affairs of her people, this talented Indian girl owns and manages a farm of 300 acres. She manages every detail, from hiring and firing the laborers to marketing the crops. She has made a thorough study of agriculture. Her garden is said to be the show place of her community. Any man in her section of Montana will tell you that the horse she fears does not exist. Most of the Flathead Indians are members of the Roman Catholic faith, and Miss Lemery is a well-known graduate of the Holy Name College of Oregon. This hustling and determined girl spent most of the winter in Washington in an effort to persuade Congress to give the Indians fairer treatment in the management and disposal of their property.

The Burial of Moses.

By Nebo's lonely mountain,
On this side Jordan's wave,
In a vale in the land of Moah,
There lies a lonely grave;
But no man dug that sepulchre,
And no man saw it e'er,
For the angels of God upturned the sod,
And laid the dead man there.

That was the grandest funeral
That ever passed on earth;
But no man heard the tramping
Or saw the train go forth;
Noiselessly as the daylight
Comes when the night is done,
And the crimson streak on ocean's cheek
Grows into the great sun,—

Noiselessly as the springtime
Her crown of verdure weaves,
And all the trees on all the hills
Open their thousand leaves,—
So, without sound of music,
Or voice of them that wept,
Silently down from the mountain crown
The great procession swept.

Perchance the bald old eagle
On gray Beth-peor's height,
Out of his rocky eyrie
Looked on the wondrous sight.
Perchance the lion, stalking,
Still shuns the hallowed spot;
For beast and bird have seen and heard
That which man knoweth not.

Lo! when the warrior dieth,
His comrades in the war,
With arms reversed and muffled drum
Follow the funeral car.
They show the banners taken,
And tell his battles won,
And after him lead his masterless steed,
While peals the minute gun.

Amid the noblest of the land
Men lay the sage to rest,
And give the bard an honored place
With costly marble dressed,
In the great minster transept,
Where lights like glories fall,
And the choir sings, and the organ rings
Along the emblazoned wall.

This was the bravest warrior
That ever huddled sword;
This the most gifted poet
That ever breathed a word;
And never earth's philosopher
Traced, with his golden pen,
On the deathless page truths half so sage
As he wrote down for men.

And had he not high honor?
The hillside for his pall,
To lie in state while angels wait.
With stars for tapers tall;
And the dark rock pines, like tossing plumes,
Over his bier to wave;
And God's own hand, in that lonely land,
To lay him in the grave,—

In that deep grave, without a name,
Whence his uncoffined clay
Shall break again,—O wondrous thought!
Before the judgment day;
And stand, with glory wrapped around,
On the hills he never trod,
And speak of the strife that won our life
With the incarnate Son of God.

O lonely tomb in Moah's land!
O dark Beth-peor's hill!
Speak to these curious hearts of ours,
And teach them to be still.
God hath his mysteries of grace,—
Ways that we can not tell;
He hides them deep, like the secret sleep
Of him He loved so well.—C. F. Alexander.

Retrospection.

Tears, idle tears, I know not what they mean,
Tears from the depth of some divine despair
Rise in the heart, and gather to the eyes,
In looking on the happy autumn fields,
And think of the days that are no more.

Fresh as the first beam glittering on a sail,
That brings our friends up from the under world;
Sad as the last which reddens over one
That sinks with all we love below the verge,—
So sad, so fresh, the days that are no more.

Ah, sad and strange as in dark summer dawns
The earliest pipe of half-awakened birds
To dying ears, when unto dying eyes
The casement slowly grows a glimmering square;
So sad, so strange, the days that are no more.

Dear as remembered kisses after death,
And sweet as those by hopeless fancy feigned
On lips that are for others; deep as love,
Deep as first love, and wild with all regret,—
O Death in Life, the days that are no more.

—Lord Tennyson.

IN THE DAYS OF VICTORIA.

Lady Georgiana Peel Writes a Volume of Her Reminiscences.

There are few more interesting links with the past than this substantial volume embodying the recollections of Lady Georgiana Peel as compiled by her daughter, Ethel Peel. Lady Peel tells us that her mother at the age of twenty married the second Lord Ribblesdale, who died in 1832, leaving her with four little children, three girls and a boy. Three years later she married Lord John Russell, the father of the author, then a well-known minister of the crown, a statesman with ever increasing influence over the country, the author and mover of the Reform bill, and a reformer at a time when reform was little understood. "I was glad to hear," wrote his brother, William Russell, in 1829, "you say that you meant to touch the poor laws; it is a bold thing to do, but very necessary. You will be abused by every ignorant political economist." The author was born in 1836, and therefore is now eighty-four years of age. Her mother was at the coronation of Queen Victoria, who mentions Lady John Russell in her diary, who "saw me leave the palace, arrive at the Abbey, leave the Abbey and again return to the palace." She herself dimly remembers the marriage of Queen Victoria and of being told to run to the window and see the carriages pass:

My sisters and I used to go very often to Buckingham Palace, while the court was in residence, for our aunt, Miss Harriet Lister, our "darling little Aunt Bunny," as we called her, was one of the queen's maids of honor, and often asked her little nieces to come to tea, and very delighted we were to go; especially as, sometimes, if the queen heard we were there, she would send for us to come to her dressing-room, where we would sit and watch her long fair hair being brushed by two dressers. On some occasions she looked very serious and thoughtful, but sometimes she was full of fun. I remember once or twice she got up, and taking our hands danced about the room with us. At this time she gave us children many little presents, which are now our greatest treasures. One of mine was a heart-shaped gold locket, with Queen Victoria's hair in it, and a pretty gold chain for my neck—I gave the locket and chain to my first granddaughter, Rosemary Peel, the daughter of my soldier son, who served all through the great war, receiving the M. C., the D. S. O. and har, and the C. M. G. Another is a little china doll dressed in china clothes, the exact fashion of that period. Perhaps the most valuable is a dear little gold peacock with a jeweled tail of emeralds and rubies. I wonder if "our precious little lady," as her maids of honor called her, knew how long and tenderly her gifts would be kept.

The author's father was prime minister at the time of the Chartist riots, and she tells us of her childish dismay at the discovery that one of her teachers had been able to make his way through the mob and so to give her the usual lesson. The Irish question was then very much to the front, and it was largely for the relief of Ireland that Sir Robert Peel threw his weight to the side of free trade and cheap bread for Ireland, though not before the famine had broken many an Irishman's heart and caused the death of thousands. Lady Peel tells us that at that time she was eleven years old:

I remember going over to Ireland with my parents, to stay with Lord Clarendon, then the lord-lieutenant. I remember the dense black crowd on the quay at Kingstown, waiting for the boat's arrival, and the lane of people through which we walked to the carriages that met us—I don't remember any railway then from Kingstown to Dublin. The hosts of Irish people were all shouting at the tops of their voices one word, repeated again and again, which as the boat stood in nearer for landing the passengers, we heard to be—"Repale! Repale! Repale!"

They meant the Union of Ireland with England.

I wonder if it ever will be "repaled"; certainly my father would not be party to it.

Lady Peel tells us that she was a great diary keeper, a fact to which we doubtless owe the present volume. Every evening she recorded the events of the day, whether important or not. Great notables as well as the man who came to tune the piano alike find places in her diary. She tells us that the cholera was a continual menace to London in her early days, and incidentally and in the same connection she gives us an amusing story of her father:

The cholera is, to this generation, absolutely unknown in England, and must seem to them as far off as the plagues of Pharaoh. In my young days it was a continual menace. I must insert here an amusing incident happening to my father. "I am very concerned," he said one day to the hairdresser who was standing behind him cutting his hair, "to hear of the fresh case of cholera in this neighborhood." "No one can prevent 'em, my lord," answered the man while he snipped and cut, "it's regularly got into the hair." "Not into mine!" exclaimed my father, really mistaking his meaning and nearly jumping out of his chair. He said he had seldom received such a shock!

Dickens and Thackeray were frequent visitors at Lady Peel's home, often lunching and dining there. Dickens was usually conspicuous owing to his wearing a pink shirt front embroidered with white, "but a genius can always wear whatever he chooses." Sometimes he would be seized with a fit of shyness or modesty, for he would suddenly slip away immediately after dinner, and people who came in later, having been asked to meet him, would all be saying: "But where is Mr. Charles Dickens?" Thackeray generally liked to leave immediately after dinner and not come up to the drawing-room to talk to the ladies. And another visitor was Lord Macaulay:

Perhaps the most interesting of all the friends who constantly came to both Chesham Place and Pembroke Lodge was

"Macaulay." He was invariably called "Macaulay" without any prefix, and I think used even to give his name like that for the servant to announce him. Oddly enough, I do not remember being very much impressed by this famous man. He seemed quite a matter of course, though to hear him talk must have been an education in itself. Every one expected, and wished him to hold forth the whole time he was there. Young and frivolous people of my day—of whom, I must say, he never took much notice—used to find this rather irksome, and approved much of the tale told, that some years before, Sydney Smith had said very gravely, towards the end of dinner, "Macaulay, when I'm dead, you'll be sorry you never heard me talk." The reverend gentleman also alluded to him as "that talk-mill Macaulay." My sister Isabel was a great admirer of his. She would tell how one day when she came down to dinner, when Macaulay was the first arrival, she found him declaiming to Johnny—then seven years old—as if he were a whole dinner party. It showed he did not talk to impress his hearers, but from the most intense interest in the subject.

Distinguished foreigners were always more or less in evidence at Pembroke Lodge, and the author tells us that she asked her father for an increased dress allowance in order that she might be garbed becomingly for these occasions. After grave consideration he promised to raise her dress allowance to one hundred pounds a year, which was then considered a generous amount for the daughter of an aristocrat:

An interesting recollection to people of the present day is that of a little boy who used to come with his parents, Count and Countess Bernstorff, and while they were sitting talking in the drawing-room used to run all about the garden by himself, exploring everywhere. I don't know how many little Bernstorffs there were, but I strongly suspect that little boy is now the notorious Count Bernstorff the late ambassador from Germany to America.

Another distinguished visitor was Sir Edwin Landseer, and the author notes a memorable dinner party when she was taken in by Mr. Disraeli. She says he talked incessantly, but her chief recollection is of his shirt front, which was made of white book muslin over a very bright rose-colored satin foundation which shone through it. She tells us that she did not enjoy his company very much, as he was too theatrical and continually held forth to the whole table. And then we have a glimpse of Jenny Lind:

Another most interesting person was Jenny Lind. The diva never had much time to come out to other people's houses, but she would often invite us to the pretty house she and her husband, Mr. Goldschmidt, had bought near Roehampton. She used to enjoy showing it to her friends, and displaying her collection of treasures. "And they all came out of here," she would say, laughing and pointing to her mouth. The little old chapel down Roehampton Lane could very seldom hold its congregation on Sundays, because of that heavenly voice, chanting the psalms, and singing the old hymns, as if the overwhelming beauty of it were the most usual thing in the world. Mr. Francis Palgrave has described her voice as "unspeakably lovely," and her acting, not as acting, but simply showing her thoughts. "The simplicity of a great soul." She seemed instinctively to know and to be able to enter into the sweetest and highest part of human nature, and, what was more, to be able to feel and interpret, as though it were happening to herself, the sadness and misery too often inflicted on it. A long time has passed since she has joined the "Choir Invisible," but I still remember hearing her voice rising and filling the great hall in the Crystal Palace, as she took the soprano part in some oratorio, and how we all went wild over Jenny Lind on those evenings when she was singing to the packed opera house, her audience hanging breathlessly on every glorious note. Has any one who heard this famous prima donna take any part ever forgotten it? We made it a custom to drive up from Richmond to an early dinner, and then go to the opera, or to any evening party which we wished to attend.

The author's father was frequently invited by the queen to Abergeldie Castle in Scotland, the whole house being placed at his disposal. The castle was close to Balmoral and it was convenient for the queen to have a minister at hand whom she could consult. The queen, we are told, always attended the Abergeldie Kirk on Sundays:

An amusing little incident that has somehow stuck in my memory is of Colonel Grey handing round the collecting box—which was like a long ladle—during the service. As was the custom, he had been all round to every one in the kirk first, and came into the queen's pew last. I suppose he must have been nervous, or he stumbled, for down went the box on the floor with a tremendous rattle, all the shillings and sixpences and pennies rolling noisily about everywhere. This was too much for the queen, also the sight of Colonel Grey's worried and apologetic countenance. She went into fits of laughter, shaking with mirth. Bessie and I, who were in the next pew, hurried to Colonel Grey's aid, and went down on our knees, searching for money, but we were also nearly helpless with laughter, and crawled on the floor much longer than we need have done, so that no one should see our faces. I don't think the little princes and princesses were present on that Sunday.

The author married Archibald, the son of General Jonathan Peel, and she tells us many stories of her father-in-law. For a time he was chief of the war office when there was much talk of an enemy invasion. "Yes," he said one day, "I hear of many very good plans for invading the country, but no one has ever explained to me how the enemy would ever get out again!"

Another story of General Peel's connected with his imperfect knowledge of the French language I must not omit. It occurred when he was—I forget on what occasion—entertained at a banquet in Paris. Mistrusting his capability of conversing in French, he talked during most of the dinner to a neighbor, among his entertainers, who he knew liked airing his English, but after a time he made up his mind he must talk to the silent French gentleman on his left. He gathered his French together, and hazarded a remark. "Quelle chamhre magnifique!" he said, with many distinctly foreign gesticulations. The man leant towards him confidentially; General Peel braced himself to understand. "Aint a patch on our Guildall," was the whisper that reached him, with an unmistakable accent. All the general's timidity of him throughout the banquet had been wasted!

General Peel was much addicted to horse racing and was the owner of more than one distinguished animal. He even found excuses for betting, although he shrewdly pointed out that there could not be very much in it or the bookmakers would all be rich men, which certainly they were not:

General Peel had a good story illustrating the sharpness of dealers, with whom he said no gentleman could compete successfully at selling horses. The following is the dialogue, which he would relate in his own inimitable way: Intending Buyer (inspecting horse for sale)—Can he gallop? Dealer (turning up his eyes admiringly and drawing a long breath)—Can he gallop? Hoo, hoo! Purchaser (delighted)—And can he jump? Dealer (ecstatically)—Can he jump? Ho, ho! Purchaser, quite satisfied, concluded the deal, but found the horse could neither gallop nor jump. The dealer when taken to task remarked that he had never said he could!

Archibald Peel in his early life had an insatiable taste for boxing and was no mean adversary with the gloves. None the less he gave much time to reading and at Oxford he came under the influence of Professor Jowett, who is described as the most inspiring of tutors:

A story of Professor Jowett's which is now a well-known chestnut my husband heard from "Old Jowett's" own lips. The professor would tell how he one day arrived at a toll-gate and found he had no money in his pocket. Wishing to go through on credit, he said to the gatekeeper, "I am the master of Balliol." "You may be the master of Balliol," replied the man, "but if you haint the master of twopence you don't go through 'ere!"

In 1868 the author and her family went to live at Gerwyn in Wales, and among the earliest visitors was Alfred Tennyson:

A very delightful thing happened on this visit of Edward Cradock to the Gerwyn. The very first morning after he arrived, wheels were heard approaching up the long avenue, and who should drive up but Alfred Tennyson, the Poet Laureate. He came rattling up to the house in a very tumble-down old dog-cart, which he had found at Wrexham station, and hired to bring him the six miles to the Gerwyn. I was quite in a flutter at having two guests instead of one. There was plenty of room at the Gerwyn in those days, and one under the roof was at his disposal, with a glorious view from the window, which I knew he would appreciate. I inquired the next morning if he had heard anything of the nursery party—my three step-children—who were domiciled close by, and he answered, "I heard a few faint splashes in the early morn." To entertain Alfred Tennyson was to entertain an ideal guest. In the evening A. and I, and Uncle Edward and the Bard were gathered round the fire, while he read out, in his beautiful many-toned voice, some of the magnificent poetry with which he had that year, or the year before, enriched the world. I remember how his great hands were continually moving as he read, now locked together till the knuckles were white, now unlocked and resting on the arms of his chair. He read to us his wonderful love poem, "Maud," and many of his hallads.

The author is now living at Hampton Court Palace, and here, she says, her grandchildren "bring the rushing times of the twentieth century to overwhelm my remembrances of once familiar faces in my long experience of life in nearly two-thirds of the nineteenth century."

RECOLLECTIONS OF LADY GEORGIANA PEEL. Compiled by her daughter, Ethel Peel. New York: John Lane Company; $5.

Rev. Dr. John Krantz of Paterson, New Jersey, has felt the feeble pulses of and prescribed for more churches afflicted with debt than any other man in the United States, perhaps in the world. During the last twenty years he has raised approximately $4,000,000. Now he averages $250,000 a year. Brother Krantz was not always a doctor of debt. From 1876 to 1877 he served acceptably as business manager of the New York Methodist, which paper later merged with the Christian Advocate, and then for nineteen years he was in the pastorate of the Newark Methodist Episcopal Conference. It was after he became sales agent for the Methodist Book Concern that his friends discovered in Dr. Krantz a peculiar and fascinating talent for flattening plethoric pocket-books. As a debt-raiser he has been likened, and aptly, to the late Chaplain McCabe, whose place on the Methodist financial platform he has taken to some extent in securing funds for churches and benevolences.

The Amazon Valley is said to be the greatest undeveloped region in the world which is yet untouched. The soil is said to be extraordinarily fertile. The forests offer woods in inexhaustible variety, many of them cabinet woods of rare value. Of vegetable oil nuts-a tenth part only is known to the outside world. Resins, gums, spices, medicinal plants, fibres abound in infinite variety. Kapok grows along the banks of most of the main river, but not a pound of it is exported to the United States, although America imported 7,000,000 pounds last year from far-away Java. There are mineralized areas said to contain coal, iron, gold, silver, and precious metals of many kinds. They have not yet been prospected.

The 350,000 American Indians in the United States are gradually being "absorbed in the body politic of the nation." They have changed from game hunters and wanderers to land-holders and home-builders. About 37,000 farmers are cultivating almost 1,000,000 acres and 47,000 own live stock worth about $38,000,000. It is said that there are a few Indian students in almost all colleges in the country.

Coal and sugar are exported to Canada from this country in great quantities in spite of the fact that there is frequent shortage here. Canada always seems to be sufficiently supplied with American sugar.

BANKING AND INVESTMENT NEWS.

San Francisco's bank clearings for the week ended Saturday, August 7th, aggregated $151,300,000, compared with $142,600,000 in the corresponding week last year. Saturday's total was $25,000,000.

Gold held by the Twelfth District Reserve Bank declined $1,660,000 during the week ending August 6th, the report issued on Saturday showed. Total gold reserves decreased $3,017,000 and total reserves $2,888,000.

Total bills on hand increased $3,207,000, principally because of a growth in discounted bills secured by other than government war obligations. Total earning assets were up $3,190,000, for the same reason. Total resources were $1,842,000 greater.

materially. This is natural in view of the general uncertainty of the money situation, transportation difficulties, and the slackening demand from the automobile trade, which for some time has been among the principal consumers of steel.

Some authorities believe that when stocks now piling up at the mills are released by improvement in the transportation situation the available supply will be greater than demand and there will consequently be a slump in buying and a recession in prices to a level probably slightly above that maintained by the Steel Corporation.

and economic conditions generally, does not share these views. He believes that the steel trade will enjoy prosperity for many months. He says:

"Production can not increase beyond transportation facilities, which constitute the neck of the industrial hottle. Until transportation facilities are adequate—and this will be some time—the demand is likely to exceed supply.

"The natural law of supply and demand will enforce stability of values until a narrow margin between supply and demand is reached.

"Admitting that demand in some quarters may slacken, we have in the first case the pending increase in freight rates, which is practically certain to mean greater consumption of steel by the railroads, normally the best customers of the steel companies.

"Further, we have the certainty of bumper crops with high prices for agricultural products, which means invigorated demand for steel and other goods.

"The tight money situation, while it has affected production of and demand for luxuries, means that the available cash and credit is being reserved for legitimate necessary production. Incidentally the steel companies as a whole are well fortified financially.

"The demand for steel is still strong and manufacturers, although by no means accepting all the business offered, are getting practically as much new business as they are producing. The steel mills are assured of a high rate of production throughout the year and longer.

"It is true that the demands from the automobile companies is slackening, but the slack is being taken up hy the increased demand from manufacturers of agricultural implements. The demand from this source is unusually heavy, due to the prosperity of the agriculturists."

Cities Service Company during June continued to show good improvement in earnings and active development work in various fields and pools in the Mid-Continent territory was carried on. At present in Kansas and Oklahoma active drilling operations are under way by Empire Gas and Fuel Company and subsidiaries in the Eldorado, the Augusta, the Elhing, the Douglas and the Rosalia pools in Butler County, Kansas; in the Tetter and the Beaumont fields in Greenwood County, Kansas; in the Florence pool in Marion County, Kansas; in the Winfield pool, Cowley County, Kansas; and in the Sedan pool in Chautauqua County, Kansas. In Oklahoma, active operations are being carried on in the Cherokee Nation in Washington County, the Osage Nation in Osage County, the Empire and Duncan fields in Stephens County, the Fox pool in Carter County, the Walters pool in Cotton County, the Beggs pool in Okmulgee County, and the Hewitt pool in Carter County. The outlook in the oil production end of the company's operations has never been better. The new acreage recently developed has proven very profitable and operations by Empire Gas and Fuel Company, as well as by other companies, have enhanced the values of other large tracts of land which Empire Gas and Fuel Company has under lease in the oil fields which at the present time are holding the attention of experienced oil operators.

Earnings of Cities Service Company for the first six months of 1920 showed an increase of $1,980,481 in gross over the first six months of 1919, while, after providing for all expenses, interest, preferred dividends, and other prior charges, there was a balance for the six months available for reserves, dividends on the common stock and surplus of $9,120,342, an increase of $1,720,185 over the first six months of 1919, this balance being equivalent to $45.66 a share per year on the common stock outstanding in the hands of the public. For June, 1920, gross earnings increased $536,232 over June, 1919, while, after providing for all expenses, interest, preferred dividends, and other charges, the balance available for reserves, dividends on the common stock, and surplus for the month was $1,533,962, an increase of $505,665. On July 1, 1920, total surplus and reserves of Cities Service Company were $49,322,071, while for the twelve months ending June 30th there was earned on the common stock outstanding in the hands of the public $40.13 a share, with requirements for payment of the preferred dividends for the twelve months earned 4.33 times. In the first six months of 1920, requirements for payment of preferred dividends were earned 4.95 times.

The freight rate increases are quite as liberal as the railroad managements had any hope for, and they are not slow in showing their appreciation in the change that has come over the spirit of the Interstate Commerce Commission. Heretofore rate increases, where granted at all, seem to have been granted grudgingly, but at last the absolute necessities of the situation were too potent to be disregarded. Even the shipping interest have made no material objection, feeling, of course, that in the end the public will pay anyway. It is a good deal better as a matter of fact for the public to pay more for transportation facilities than to run the risk of either going without the things it desires to buy or being compelled to pay ridiculously high prices for them. It stands to reason that inefficient and inadequate transportation facilities will add vastly more to the cost of things than even a more generous rate increase than the one just announced.

The professional element in Wall Street is of such a bearish temperament, however, that it seized upon the opportunity furnished by the old argument of the "good news being out" to hammer the market generally. Prices have slumped in many instances below previous low levels of the year. What has worked around in favor of the bear party in Wall Street has been the fact that as hanks have called upon clients to reduce their loan accounts the latter, in turn, have been liquidating their securities. There is such a vast amount of credit tied in delayed transportation that anything such as a freight rate increase that will be found working for better transportation will also be a most important factor in relieving the credit situation. This in turn would reduce the impulse to liquidate stocks. Such liquidation as is going on is in the great majority of cases not due to any feeling of insecurity as to actual values, but has been more or less involuntary and by persons who will want to repossess themselves of these same securities at the earliest moment possible.

The railroads are entering a new era and railroad securities are at panic levels, and the general run of railroad stocks offer most splendid opportunities for the speculative or investment buyer.

With the banks talking deflation all the time, hearish sentiment among professionals as regards industrial issues generally is the more pronounced. Perhaps in regard to the woolen trade this sentiment is as much intensified as in any other case. The public may not and should not be doing as much extravagant buying as it has been doing in the past, but when it comes to the ability to make a single dollar go farther than it did before it will likely take a long time to bring this about. It will not be long before there is a great change in sentiment in Wall Street and we will be wondering then why we did not take advantage of the opportunities to buy stocks at low prices.

A recapitulation of the activities in the New York stock market from 1904 to 1920 shows four "bull markets" (1906, 1909, 1916, and 1919) and five stock "panics" (1904, 1907, 1914, 1917, and 1920). The aftermath of a "bull market" has invariably been a stock "panic." It apparently takes two years to culminate the upward trend and allow the "pools" to distribute the entire floating supply of stocks and one year to accumulate them in a down market. For instance, starting from a panicky conditions in 1914, due to the beginning of the European war, the market began to rise and the upward trend lasted until November 23, 1916. Then came the stock panic of 1917. From a low point, December, 1917, we had another bull market which lasted two years, ending November, 1919. History has again repeated itself, and the year of 1920 is almost an exact replica of 1917. A veritable stock panic in fact, where stocks have broken on an average (using seventeen active industrials) of $70 per share.

The extreme low points in a stock market are generally reached after the elimination of the margin trader has been effected. At the present time brokers are carrying only about 30 per cent. of their usual commitments. The month of August also is usually one of downward activity. "Bear markets" often culminate during this month. With the floating supply of stocks in strong hands at this time, one may hope for a sharp upturn in the fall of the year. When the turn comes it will be sharp and decisive, as a tremendous "short interest" no doubt exists at present. The depression in the minds of traders caused by the Polish situation is plainly apparent at this time, and heavy liquidation has taken place in the past three weeks. Traders should remember how the market acted during the great German drive in 1918, and also last year during the steel strike, and not become too "bearish" at present low levels when first-class industrial stocks are selling on a basis where they net from 9 1/2 to 11 per cent. per annum. Remember the words of J. Pierpont Morgan and don't sell the United States short. —W. C. Gregg.

The Associated Oil Company has announced that it has offered formally to the Navy Department to furnish whatever may be its equitable pro rata of fuel oil to care for Pacific Coast needs until September 30th at the present pipe-line terminal market price of $2 per barrel.

The company announced it has no fuel oil whatever in excess of its commercial customers' needs and is drawing heavily on its reserve stocks, but nevertheless recognizes the essential needs of the navy and is willing to take its share of the load. The following statement has been issued by the executive committee:

"In view of the widely published and conflicting statements about the so-called 'seizure' of oil by the navy, the executive committee of the Associated Oil Company authorizes the following statement:

"First—The Associated Oil Company has at all times recognized the navy's essential need for oil and at all times is willing as a patriotic obligation, aside from any other motive, to supply the navy with the allotment falling to the Associated Oil Company, as determined by its relative capacity to furnish fuel oil.

"Second—Independent, however, of any question of allotment, the Associated Oil Company has never failed to meet any demand of the navy for oil. During the past three years the navy has declined to pay the market price which all other consumers have paid, offering figures below the market price and leaving to the future any question of adjustment. To protect its claims for the market prices the Associated Oil Company has recognized the demands instead of the ordinary purchase requisitions of the navy for oil, result being the so-called seizures, which are seizures only in a technical sense, as the facilities of the oil company have been as freely and as fully at the command of the navy in making the oil deliveries as they are for any other customer.

delivered to the navy up to June 30th recently have been adjusted with Admiral Countz in Washington. The present question is whether or no the current market price or the offer of the navy of $1.72 at San Francisco Bay points shall govern. We anticipate this will be amicably adjusted. The Associated Oil Company is willing to accept for the three months ending September 30th a price of $2 per barrel for its share of the obligation to furnish the navy fuel oil at its pipe-line terminals on San Francisco Bay. At Los Angeles and San Diego it has no tankage or pipe-line facilities.

"In this connection attention is directed to the urgent need for the conservation of fuel oil by all consumers and the encouragement in every proper way of greater production. The demand is far outrunning the supply. The greatly increased cost of labor and the shortage in casing supply, together with the lessened proved areas in which to drill, have resulted in a material slowing up in development work. way possible to proceed with their work of development and exploration."

There has been a liquidating movement in most of the commodity markets lately, due to the continued efforts of the Federal Reserve Board to build up a stronger financial position in connection with the "deflation process." It will take a long time before much real headway may be noticed in this regard, but while the movement is under way it means a natural restriction of buying generally except for current demands.

Every one knows that cotton and wheat and corn are selling at ridiculously high prices, and every one believes that in the long run present prices will be cut in two. Consequently the bears in the commodity markets are always alert for opportunities to attack prices successfully, and sometimes they will be assisted in their efforts by arguments outside of the crops themselves.

There seems to have been very splendid progress made in some portions of the cotton belt since the last government report, and the prospect of increasing production in the favored sections has more than made up for the weevil losses reported. Foreign political affairs, as well as domestic trade matters, have been against prices also, but banks at last seem disposed to encourage liquidation of cotton holdings in a way that can hardly be ignored by the ordinary borrower.

The black-rust scare in the Northwest does not seem to be spreading much, and, indeed, the damage is, as yet, confined to a fairly small area. Meanwhile wheat crop prospects have increased remarkably and harvesting in the Southwest has added very appreciably to the favorable situation.

Austria has been looked upon generally as the defeated war power that has suffered most and was emerging as a crippled and almost hopeless nation. Recent advices are, however, to the effect that the Austrian peasant has become the savior of his country through hard work. Indeed this particular granary of Europe seems pretty full, and, as it has been filling, the spirits of the people have risen remarkably merely on account of the presence of food in quantity. On the other hand, the possibilities of having a fair exportable surplus have given a new life to the industrial element. It is certain that Europe will get back to work some day or other as a whole, and we may be fairly sure that there will be a lessening demand for our food products. At present the freight-car congestion impedes deliveries and the cash grains are quite high, while the options have been suffering considerably. The selling side of wheat and corn, and oats as well, seems the most reasonable at present.

James J. Hill's billion estimate per year and over as necessary to be expended by the railroads in order to make for efficiency in our transportation world seems to be a sort of perennial proposition. As the Interstate Commerce Commission has announced freight rate increases, the railroads should begin placing orders for equipment in large quantities. The outlook for the equipment companies is remarkably bright as far ahead as one can reasonably see, and this means a very splendid underlying demand for steel products, and in the circumstances it is difficult to see where we are going to have any material reduction in steel prices for a long time to come.

Copper metal is selling a good deal too low as compared with steel, as it will play a very large part in the reconstruction of the world's business affairs—electrification of railways where possible being admittedly wise economy.

In the large banks in New York and Chicago the title of assistant vice-president has become a generally accepted term. It is given to an executive who is between the cashier and vice-president in the personnel of the bank.

Among the first banks on the Pacific Coast to use the title of assistant vice-president is the Anglo-California Trust Company of San Francisco. At the August meeting of the board of directors of the Anglo-California Trust Company Fred V. Vollmer and C. L. Smith, assistant cashiers, and R. D. Brigham, assistant to the president, were elected assistant vice-presidents of the company. The promotion to assistant vice-president is a distinct advancement to these three men and the result of good services rendered.

Mr. Vollmer will be assistant vice-president and office manager; Mr. Smith will be assistant vice-president and real estate officer; and Mr. Brigham will be assistant vice-president, manager of branches, and in charge of new business development work.

American farmers have increased their beet acreage production 10 per cent. over last year, but the actual production, due to more favorable growing conditions, promises to be 40 per cent. greater. Sugar production from cane in the United States makes even a better showing with a 47 per cent. increase.

Although the European sugar-beet acreage has been enlarged only 13 per cent. since last year, their normal acreage is so large that this means an increase equal to 45 per cent. of the average acreage harvested in this country during the last five years. Considering the prevailing high prices of sugar, even a larger increase was expected, but most of the price raise came after the crop had left the growers' hands.

It is now possible, with the complete figures of the total trade of the United States in the fiscal year 1920, to compare the trade of the first fiscal year following the war with that of the last fiscal year preceding the war. These figures, says the National City Bank of New York, which presents this analysis of the foreign trade at the present time, compared with that of the fiscal year 1914, which ended just before the outbreak of the war, indicate tremendous gains, though it must be remembered that in nearly all cases a considerable part of the gains are due to higher prices. In practically all instances, however, there is a large advance in the quantity of the merchandise, both imported and exported.

Imports as a whole, adds the bank's statement, which stand at $5,239,000,000 for the fiscal year 1920, shows an increase of 177 per cent. over the fiscal year 1914, when they were $1,894,000,000. Exports, which stand at $8,111,000,000, show an increase of 243 per cent. over 1914, when they stood at $2,365,000,000. Of domestic exports only, excluding the foreign merchandise re-exported, the total stands in 1920 at $7,950,000,000, or 241 per cent. over 1914, when the total was $2,330,000,000. Re-exportation of foreign merchandise shows large gains, the total for 1920 standing at $160,000,000 against $35,000,000 in 1914.

Manufacturing material showed the largest increase on the import side, and foods and manufactures the big increases on the export side. The value of the raw manufacturing material imported jumped from $634,000,000 in 1914 to $2,160,000,000 in 1920, an increase of 241 per cent. This increase occurred in many lines of articles, but especially in india rubber, raw silk, raw cotton, wool, hides and skins, and tin. Of the ten principal manufacturing articles imported of a character which can be reduced to a uniform basis of pounds, namely, cotton, wool, silk, fibers, rubber, hides and skins, tobacco, tin, copper, and gums, the quantity, measured in pounds, increased a little less than 50 per cent. when comparing the 1920 imports with those of 1914, while the total value of the same article increased to a much greater extent.

The College National Bank of Berkeley announces the opening of a bond department in connection with their general banking business. The announcement is as follows:

"The sole aim of this department is to be of service to you. Our New York and San Francisco connections have been chosen with infinite care and merit our confidence and yours. They already have the unequivocal support of the great investing public. We will buy any bond for your account at the market price. The service is at your disposal in collecting bond interest, stock dividends, or otherwise facilitating your financial transactions of any nature. Any good bond at this time is a good buy. Come in and talk over the situation whether you are in the market just now or not. Our information is reliable and up to the minute."

The crop-moving season, during which the country's credit requirements reach their maximum intensity, is now close at hand (says the National Bank of Commerce in its August letter on the credit situation). Because of the difficulties of transportation, it may be expected that the volume of credit needed this year to finance crop marketing will be larger than usual. While the traffic movement has improved slightly, sufficient relief can hardly be expected to the extent necessary to permit of the clearing away of existing congestion and the resumption of a normal movement of agricultural staples in the fall. The crops, to an unusual extent, may have to be held this year. Recent experience has demonstrated fully the effect of any interference with orderly commodity shipments in tying up an enormous volume of credit.

This prospect enhances the importance of the credit situation, which during the current period of June 16th to July 15th has experienced no relief from the tension of the past several months. Since last November the Federal Reserve institutions and member banks have been seeking to curtail non-essential borrowing, to limit loans to necessary requirements and to reduce gradually the volume of outstanding credit. In the former of these aims they have in large measure been successful, and there can be no question of the underlying soundness of the general credit structure. There has thus far, however, been no reduction of the aggregate volume of credit outstanding. The efforts of the banks have simply limited further credit expansion and the volume of credit at the beginning of July exceeded that outstanding at the close of 1919. The failure to effect a normal credit liquidation before the commencement of the crop-moving demands has in large measure been due to transportation difficulties which have obstructed free commodity movements and occasioned the credit stringency which became pronounced earlier in the year.

Were the banks still operating under the old banking system the outlook would be serious. But since the banking power of the country has become well coordinated under the Federal Reserve system, with its flexibility for meeting such a situation, there is no reason to apprehend serious difficulty in caring for essential credit requirements during the approaching season. In this connection it may be noted that the steady outflow of gold from this country has been supplanted at least temporarily by a moderate net inward movement of the metal, and this in a measure relieves one source of pressure against credit facilities. Commercial and industrial credit requirements, moreover, may be expected to become somewhat less pressing should the tendencies toward price recessions and reduced volume of business continue. While credit will be available to meet the country's essential requirements, there continues to be no prospect of its being available except for such use.

Net earnings of $40,399.56 have been reported for the first six months of the present year by the C. L. Best Tractor Company.

A Good Investment

We shall be pleased to explain in detail the many attractive features of SUTTER BASIN COMPANY 8% BONDS. They combine a very high rate of interest with most unusual security.

Furthermore, they suit the investment requirements of every one.

They can be bought to mature in from three to nine years, and in denominations of $100, $500 or $1000.

Mr. J. Ogden Armour of Chicago unconditionally guarantees them by endorsement on the back of each bond.

In addition to showing the strong position of this California organization, the statement of earnings is significant of the company's management when it is compared with the estimate of earnings for the year made more than three months ago by the company.

In April it was estimated net earnings for the year 1920 would be $750,000, and at the rate of earnings during the first six months this amount will be exceeded by more than $58,000. After provision for Federal taxes net earnings have been more than nine times the interest on outstanding preferred stock.

THE LATEST BOOKS.

The Budget.

This book comes opportunely at a time when we are reaching the slow realization that the government of America is actually and to a very large extent beyond the control of the electorate. The power to raise and to spend money lies at the heart of all governmental functions, and without an adequate popular supervision of these processes we can hardly pretend to have arrived at anything like a democratic ideal. Mr. Taft, who writes an introduction to the volume, says: "Never before in the history of the country has reform of its ridiculous system of spending and raising money been so critically important." As a matter of fact there is no system. Governmental departments grab whatever they can from the treasury, practically without check or hindrance. Public participation is confined to the payment of taxes, and the funds thus contributed pass beyond the reach of public direction and control. They are commonly expended without much regard either to the necessities of the situation or the dictates of economy.

The authors have written a large book—perhaps too large—as an embodiment of their demand for a budget system alike for municipal, state, and national governments. They tell us what has already been done by some cities and states and it will be remembered that Mr. Cleveland himself effected the most notable financial reforms in New York. But the Federal government remains impotent. The unseen forces find the present system too profitable. They are too strong easily to be dislodged.

The general purpose of the work may be summarized by the four questions propounded and answered by the authors. These four questions are:

(1) On what is the mechanism of control to operate? That is, whose action is to be made subservient to the people through its use? Who is it that is to be made responsive and responsible?

(2) Why—with our system of elections which provides for freedom of choice of officers, secret ballot, accurate count, etc.—has our broad democratic electorate failed in its controlling purpose?

(3) Why have our Congress and assemblies, with their unlimited powers of inquest and discussion, still left the electorate without the information needed to enable them to act wisely and effectively? Why have the doings of those who are to be held accountable been "invisible"?

(4) Why has our leadership been irresponsible?

These questions are answered, not only with accuracy, but with vigor, and the authors are to be congratulated on a presentation that must measurably advance their plea.

Ladies of Greecourt.

This is the second of the two volumes in which Ruth Gaines records the work of French reconstruction done by the Smith College Relief Unit from its headquarters, fifteen miles from the front-line trenches on the Somme sector. Those who read the first volume entitled "Helping France" will welcome the completion of a narrative so simply and effectively written. The pencil sketches by Anna Milo Upjohn add substantially to the interest of the book.

LADIES OF GREECOURT. By Ruth Gaines. New York: E. P. Dutton & Co.; $2.50.

A Semi-Architectural Novel.

"Tamarisk Town" is quite a beautifully written novel, the author, Sheila Kaye-Smith, being very much of a stylist. Her novel begins in the '60s and is written with a Victorian leisureliness. It tells the strange story of Tamarisk Town—a sort of nickname the author gives the south-of-England town which competes with the hero for the spotlight—because of the fringe of tamarisk trees which made a misty green setting for Marlingate.

Marlingate is a mere fishing village, but Monypenny, owner of a thousand-acre estate adjoining the town, has vision. He dreams of making it one of those centres of a stately social pleasuring at the seaside, such as were the setting for several of the Jane Austen novels.

Monypenny is a man of energy and resource, and his dream is materialized. A decade passes, and Marlingate, its Parade, Assembly Room, and other characteristically seaside structures, are all held by Monypenny's dominating will inexorably within the bounds of good taste. He loves this growing city of his making, and it becomes a thing of beauty.

Lovingly the author paints its beauties; the white gleaming Parade, the terraced hills ornamented with correct and beautiful homes for the visiting gentry; the pearl and silver tints of the sea, the green and russet of the woods which between them embrace the town. The author gives any number of beautiful word-pictures of the place, but she does more. She builds up a strong and vital story of passionate love, the whole set in a quaintly attractive Victorian atmosphere.

The story takes hold of the reader; at least if he is the kind of reader who enjoys a long and leisurely story told with poetic charm and with a deep perception of the unplumbed depths of human nature.

Sheila Kaye-Smith dives deep into the seas of the soul and she brings up strange things.

For what happened to Monypenny of Marlingate, the distinguished and admired creator of the beautiful seaside resort for the gentry, is strange indeed. Monypenny, too long austere and ascetic in his life, finds love at last, and his choice of honor in the town in place of the illicit love offered him constitutes the great event in the book.

When, however, Monypenny the conventionalist gave way to Monypenny the bereft lover a strange transformation passed over his spirit. He grew to hate the beautiful seaside city of his making, and he took a strange revenge on it for the part it had played in denying him his love.

Whether the peculiar psychology thus developed is or is not founded on the probable is for the reader to decide. But in either case it adds an interesting element to a story of unusual character, and one most fascinatingly told.

TAMARISK TOWN. By Sheila Kaye-Smith. New York: E. P. Dutton & Co.; $2.50 net.

A Kut Prisoner.

Kut surrendered on April 29, 1915, after a long and determined siege by the Turks. The British believed that all ranks would be treated well as the Turks "had always fought and behaved like gentlemen." So says Mr. H. C. W. Bishop in the volume containing a narrative of his adventures. He was a subaltern of the Indian Army Reserve of Officers, joining the forces at Basra and at once moving forward for the capture of Bagdad. After a good deal of desultory fighting the British were surrounded at Kut with results that now belong to history.

Mr. Bishop tells his story in an effective but unemotional way. After a period of captivity he managed to escape into Asia Minor, eventually reaching Aberdeen on October 24th. His treatment seems to have been fairly good, and his story will take its place in the annals of a campaign of which we now know little enough.

A KUT PRISONER. By H. C. W. Bishop. New York: John Lane Company.

The Breathless Moment.

Miss Sabine Fane is reduced to poverty through the death of her improvident father, and she courageously faces the fact by taking service as housekeeper with Miss Vallance and her nephew. The nephew, Mark, ought certainly to be at the war, and Sabine wonders at what seems to be the white feather, until she learns that old Miss Vallance is a Quaker and sternly vetoes the military ambitions of the young man, who is so much in her debt as to enforce compliance with her wishes. Miss Vallance dies at about the time that Mark and Sabine discover that they are in love. Mark prepares at once to enlist, but Sabine suggests that he go away with her for a month in order that they may not be robbed of their "breathless moment." Sabine has a child which she explains by a secret marriage to a man who has been killed, and she continues to live on as housekeeper at Mark's home until he shall come home from the war and marry her. Sabine appears to be a very rash young woman, to say the least of it.

Presently comes a letter from Mark to say that he has been wounded and is coming home. But it is addressed to his aunt, who has been dead for some two years. Sabine quickly guesses the truth. Mark has lost his memory, and so he returns to his home in utter forgetfulness of Sabine, of the "breathless moment," and, of course, of the child that is his. It is an awkward situation for Sabine.

Of course we know that it will be all right in the end and we instantly foresee the operation—"triumph of modern surgery," etc.—that will restore Mark's memory and send him into the arms of the faithful Sabine. But we still think that Sabine took a big chance. She should thank the author for getting her out of a serious mess, and usually it is only authors who do that sort of thing.

Brief Reviews.

The Stratford Company has published a little volume of verse entitled "Spanish Moss and English Myrtle," by Margaret Dashiell, and relating in the main to the life of New Orleans.

Thomas Seltzer of New York has published "Touch and Go," by D. H. Lawrence. It is among the Plays for a People's Theatre Series and is concerned with the conflict between labor and capital. Price, $1.25.

Maud Lindsay is well known as a writer of stories for children. Her latest work is "Bobby and the Big Road," just published by the Lothrop, Lee & Shepard Company. It is intended for children from five to seven years of age. Price, $1.50.

Lucy Blackburn, author of "Helps on the Popular Game Auction Bridge," just published by the Stewart & Kidd Company, says that she "claims nothing original in these pages, save the arrangement of the choicest cuttings from the best writers on the game and experience gained in the years of teaching."

Dairy Exports Since the War.

The United States Department of Agriculture recently issued statistics showing that the war has caused a considerable increase in the export of dairy products. In 1914 the United States exported only 700,000,000 pounds of milk in the form of butter and cheese and no condensed milk whatever. The war worked wonders, however, in developing our foreign trade in dairy products because of the curtailment in domestic supplies of the Allies and importations from pre-war sources. During 1919 the United States shipped abroad 620,000,000 pounds of milk in the form of butter, 160,000,000 pounds of milk in the form of cheese, and 1,700,000,000 pounds of milk as condensed milk, a total of 2,550,000,000 pounds of milk as dairy products used for foreign shipment.

Indicative of the fact that the United States did not supply foreign countries with all of the dairy products it produced during the war, the factory production of butter during 1918 amounted to 793,289,301 pounds, while the output of cheese was 352,621,615 pounds and the condensed milk total was 1,675,477,360 pounds, enough of these dairy products being kept in the United States to supply domestic needs.

The department has also prepared recently estimates showing how the many billions of pounds of milk produced annually in this country are utilized. Forty-four and one-half per cent. is used as fresh milk for human food purposes, while 36 per cent. of the gross supply

San Francisco in Fiction

Charles Caldwell Dobie's new novel

Not since Frank Norris has any novelist caught the real San Francisco as Charles Caldwell Dobie has done in THE BLOOD RED DAWN. "From the very beginning the local reader feels at home," writes The Bulletin's reviewer. "There are the familiar streets and hotels, the names of which are household words. . . . That picture of the Greek restaurants on Third Street is as vivid as anything about San Francisco that has found its way into fiction. The Polk Street of Norris is not beyond the reach of comparison with the Third Street of Dobie."

Here in a novel of blended romance and realism is the subtle allure, the heart, the soul of The City of The Golden Gate. No San Franciscan can afford to miss reading this book—

Harriet and the Piper.
The reader may come to the justifiable conclusion that in this case the piper has made too heavy a charge and that so clever a girl as Harriet should not have allowed herself to worry over it. When Harriet was a young girl in poor circumstances she allowed herself to be dazzled by a clever mountebank called Royal Blondin. She went through an avowedly bogus ceremony, but left him before the marriage, such as it was, had become anything more than a name. Later in life she becomes secretary and housekeeper in the family of Richard Carter. Blondin turns up again and proceeds to make love to the daughter, Nina, threatening Harriet with exposure unless she uses her influence on his behalf. The breath of scandal may ruin her in the eyes of the women of the Carter family and we can understand why she should momentarily allow herself to be terrorized into compliance. But we can not understand why she should hide the facts after her position had become firmly established. So clever a girl must have known that Blondin had nothing to expose except his own rascality. Even when he does reveal the secret to Mr. Carter in order to revenge himself on Harriet for her failure to support his claims she still fails to defend herself by a quiet statement of the facts which must at once have been final.

The motive of the story seems a little weak, but the story itself is capitally told. The fine character of Carter, the sensual frivolity of his wife, are well described. The Carter family is typical of thousands of the newly rich, the kindly simplicity of the father, the vicious vanities of the mother, the dissipated son, the spoiled and selfish daughter who is determined to marry Blondin until she discovers that he has taken a sum of money from her father as his price for the postponement of the wedding. Harriet is, of course, the heroine, and a very good heroine she is in spite of her rather incongruous simplicities and reticences. She grows on us steadily as we read on in the story until at last we feel that she is one of the few heroines of modern fiction whom we shall wish to remember.

Banking Progress.
Those who wish for a clear and concise history of banking will find it in this volume by J. Laurence Laughlin. But it is something much more than a history. Mr. Laughlin deals with the banking problems of today, with the various expedients to protect the depositor, and with the workings of the Federal Reserve Act. He points out to us, for example, that a guaranty of deposits would mean a direct inducement to banks to rely on the fund rather than upon their own skill and prudence. Soundness of management would cease to play its part, and deposits would inevitably be secured by those who are less skilled and honest than those who now hold them. Some of the main topics of the work are "Banking Reform," "The Depositor and the Bank," "Government versus Bank Issues," "The Aldrich-Vreeland Act," "The Lending Power of a Bank," and "The Federal Reserve Act."

BANKING PROGRESS. By J. Laurence Laughlin. New York: Charles Scribner's Sons; $5.

A Brazilian Mystic.
It seems that mysticism is not always so harmless an occupation as we have been led to believe. Mr. Cunningham Graham tells us the story of Antonio Conselheiro, a Brazilian saint and wonder-worker who, some thirty or forty years ago, gathered around him a considerable company of the credulous and established a sort of government at the town of Canudos, between the provinces of Bahia and Pernambuco. The settlement soon grew to as many as twenty thousand persons, and then it began to give trouble. Mysticism gave way to unbridled criminality, and then to a sort of veiled treason. Antonio naturally believed that he was a sort of God, the common failing of mysticism corrupted by flattery. The government sent various peaceful missions to suppress this pesthouse, but they were all ineffective, and at last it was necessary to send an army of some ten thousand men in order to exterminate what had become a nuisance and a danger. We may doubt if the incident is worth quite so large a book, but those interested in primitive Brazilian customs will find here much to repay a perusal.

Our Unseen Guest.
This is one of the almost innumerable books of supposed "spirit communications" that are now being offered to the public. The messages purport to come from a dead soldier, and it may be said that in quality they are somewhat above the average, although this must not be taken as conveying the implication of praise. Indeed we search in vain for a single new ray of light.

The most remarkable thing about these volumes of "spirit communications" is that they are in hopeless disagreement with one another. Many of them, taken singly, are plausible and sometimes impressive, but their descriptions of the after-life are as wide as the poles apart. Each one seems to be a reflection of what we may reasonably suppose to have been the expectations of the writer.

Mexico in Revolution.
The celebrity who visits America is at once invested with a sort of omniscience by a somewhat credulous public and his views on every subject under the sun, even on death and immortality, are eagerly sought. He is invited to investigate the league of nations and to report a prize-fight or a political convention. It was for some such reason as these that Vicente Blasco Ibañez was commissioned to go to Mexico and to tell us all about the troubles there, their cause and their cure. The result is now before us in volume form. It is vividly and interestingly written. Its author could not write in any other way, but we hardly feel that we have been illuminated or that the tangle of the Mexican situation has been for the first time unraveled.

Gossip of Books and Authors.
So great has been the demand for the memoirs of the Empress Eugénie that the telegraphic order for the book exhausted the first edition within one week after D. Appleton & Co. brought out the announcement of the intended publication. The second edition was immediately ordered, and every indication points to the fact that it and the third edition will be sold out before the actual date of publication arrives.

The Barnard gold medal for meritorious service to science was awarded by Columbia University at its one hundred and sixty-sixth annual commencement to Albert Einstein, professor of physics in the University of Berlin in recognition of his highly original and fruitful development of the fundamental concepts of physics through application of mathematics. Professor Einstein's own explanation of his famous theory which has so excited the scientific world will be published in this country in book form under the title, "Relativity: The Special and General Theory," by Henry Holt & Co. According to the publishers, Professor Einstein's book has been translated by Robert W. Lawson of Sheffield University and will be published this fall.

Paper Clothing Developed by Germans.
Paper clothing that would withstand the rain and not rasp and crackle as the wearer strode along was one of the novel inventions to which severe war shortage forced the Germans. Dr. Oskar Spohr, who followed the growth of the industry, in a recent review of the steps by which the paper fibre was developed into wearable and washable material, assures his German readers that their paper clothing today is not half bad (says the New York Sun and Herald).

Dr. Spohr tells an interesting story of efforts to clothe a nation when all sources of supply of materials formerly used were effectively sealed. The problem, he shows, was one of the largest magnitude, for before the war Germany was dependent upon the outside world for 98.5 per cent. of her total consumption of textile raw materials. When the stores on hand began to fail the outlook was serious indeed.

All the old and out-of-date clothing of the nation was brought out of forgotten chests and long neglected store rooms and this supply eked out the needs of the people for a time. Meanwhile textile technologists made feverish search for some substitute. Early in the war it was proposed that rahhits should be raised in unprecedented number to supply the failing national table with meat and the looms threatened with starvation with a new wool fibre. It was soon shown, however, that rahhit wool could not stop the gap.

It was soon decided, Dr. Spohr reports, that only wood pulp could be produced in sufficient quantity to cope with the huge textile demand. The working of wood pulp into paper fibre of durability had been done before the war for the purpose of bag-making and the making of covers for inside use.

The raw material after treatment with heat and chemicals, consists of tiny fibres, two to four millimeters long, or much too short to be spun upon any machines so far invented. It was necessary, therefore, to work these tiny fibres into paper, cut the paper into strips and spin these strips. The resulting yarn had all the disadvantages that one would ordinarily imagine. Woven into cloth it was hard, brittle, easily tearable, and, when wet, it dissolved much like ordinary paper. It was serious business to venture forth into the rain clad in the early paper suits.

"FRIVOLITIES" AT THE COLUMBIA.

I happened to go to the Columbia on a belated matinee survey of their attraction, and went there expecting to see a forest of girls. While waiting outside—I was rather early and the crowd had not begun—along came a gray-haired dame in the sixties. Presently there straggled along two white-haired ladies who were, I should say, just climbing the rock-hound slopes to the seventies. Following these came a cozy matron in the fifties, chumming with her twenty-five-year-old daughter. This seemed a little more reasonable, but at this moment a weary, dim-eyed old citizeness of eighty tottered past me. I rubbed my eyes and looked around. But it was just a white-headed coincidence, for just about this time the stream of short-skirted, high-heeled femininity began, and the normal basis was restored. But several times during the ensuing performance my thoughts turned to those venturesome grayheads and I wondered what they thought of "the show."

It was a great show: no mistake. A real leg-and-hare-hack show. There were almost too many girls to count, and they had been selected for looks, shape, and the ability to carry gorgeous costumes with a suitable amount of swagger. "Frivolities" purports to be the naughty devices showed by Satan to console those who mourn over the alleged shortage of alcoholic refreshment. So Satan and the cluhman denied of his drinks pass from place to place, and everywhere handsome girls, dressed, overdressed or underdressed, file before the pair, showing bare legs, hare hacks, hare shoulders, and sometimes a ceinture of hare flesh peeping coyly out above a pair of Oriental pantalets. Goodness, but the diversity of costumes they think up for this sort of thing! The girls must have been prancing like mad out of one bewildering collection of horned, and veiled, and turreted, and Chinese-pagodaed, and Turkish-trousered costumes into another. Sometimes they were like animated clothes-horses, their arms extended, as they slowly paced across the stage, while, with their legs, hacks, and shoulders in temporary draped retirement, they dragged yards and yards of gayly-colored and patterned stuffs after them, or allowed them to hang in effective folds from their extended arms.

Ingenuity almost exhausted its resources. "Lovers' Lane" showed a valentine-like series of vistas connected by a winding path, along which lovers dressed in valentine pinks and blues sauntered until the entire stage was like a living valentine. Pretty girls attired in costumes of gay feathers swung in hoops like great parrots, fed the while with sweets by an attentive youth. Farmerettes in overalls, sailor girl-hoys in natty sailor suits, languorous odalisques in striking Oriental costumes, pretty Eves done up in a costume of leaves and blonde switches were among the girl effects. There were girls spilling all over the place, the chicklets looking—some of them—not quite grown up. The Eves were armed with long fishing-poles, from the ends of which dangled Japanese paper confections of some kind, with which they dallied with the hare spots on a luckless haldhead's skull. Rather cheeky on the part of the producers, it would seem. What about the haldhead that has a natural sense of dignity? However, this part of the show went rather flat at a matinee, as to make a suitable appeal it requires oodles of young men in the audience.

They have three good comedians, by the way, one of them, Frank Davis, presenting, with the aid of Belle Darnell, a characteristic and complete vaudeville turn called "Birdseed." Joseph Rolley is also expert in retailing blackface humor, Edward Gallagher serving as an excellent second. All three of these men helped on the hurlesque of "Omar the Tent-Maker," another comedian, Henry Lewis, doing promiscuous frivols by his lone. Mr. Lewis is that type of comedian who retails what Henry Arthur Jones has aptly described as "the sniggering, veiled indecencies of musical comedy." The putting out the light song was full of vulgar suggestion, and what made it worse was the ready-wittedness of the comedian in conveying a sense of prurience. Probably he has to do it, but he does it too, too well. It wouldn't be so deplorable if that were the only thing he can do, but this entertainer is expert in the line of amusing monologue.

They have a good musical-comedy tenor in the person of Richard Bold, whose powerful voice—sometimes unnecessarily forced—was heard to special advantage in "Music," a group of operatic arias rendered by Mr. Bold, the heroines of whom he sang being represented by a number of handsomely costumed beauties emerging at the auspicious moment from a huge phonograph cabinet.

There were lots of other features; any amount of them; dancing stunts, acrobatics, scenic effects, and of course a grand finale. "Frivolities," of course, is a rival to "Follies," and both always win a large and light-minded following.

"THE CRIMSON ALIBI."

All the plays of the day seem to be just story, nowadays. No man dare prophesy the future, these troublous times. Hug ourselves for our immunity though we may, Americans may yet be forced to play a part in another world tragedy. For the masses are learning their power, and America is the richest field in the world for looting. So the feeling is among the majority, entirely subconscious though it is with many, "Let's be gay, for tomorrow—" The dash is as far as our imagination goes.

Hence follies, frivolities, farces, and Crimson Alibis. The world, our world, must be well fed, well dressed, well amused during this transitional period. Yes, even though economies have begun, we must still be amused. "Who wants to think?" cries the world. "Bring on your Crimson Alibis!"

There is, to be sure, a spiritistic element in the great success "Smilin' Through." But the play, like everything else, is just story; just pretty, romantic, pathetic, pleasing story.

No, the professional thinkers can keep on the job, and once in a while we will listen, half fearfully and half abstractedly, to their pronouncements. As for the news in the daily press, well, we have begun to skim. We know, now, that this is a world of lies. German propaganda was so well done that it has opened our eyes to the fact that nearly every journal is a propagandist of some sort. So bring on your Crimson Alibis and keep us entertained, for fairy tales are necessary to replace our lost faiths.

"The Crimson Alibi" is that form of fairy story known as the detective play; the detective play of the benevolent stripe. The foxy author, like Hetty Green, writes his play backward, and six persons, I believe, were under suspicion for the murder in the prologue before they were all lined up in a final act, quaking one by one under the accusing finger of the Sherlock Holmes named David Carroll.

The foxy author, I started to say, took particular pains to win the liking or sympathy of the audience for each suspect. As for the others, he made them amiable, agreeable, pleasant people to have round. Even the detectives did not seem to yearn to hustle those they suspected, and when they arrested and handcuffed a man they did it considerably, regretfully, and with friendly sympathy.

Every one of the suspected ones had some agreeable, ingratiating trait. The one anathematized person was comfortably dead; murdered in the prologue.

The play begins with a dark stage, and we can only see faintly moving shadows, and hear the death cry of the murdered one; which, as he is supposed to be old and feeble, was a perfectly good specimen of a death cry. Yet the audience laughed aloud, in that irritating way that youthful audiences do laugh, every now and then, at perfectly satisfactory histrionic effects. I suppose it is a sort of artless vent for youthful excitement, but it must be rather trying to the players. At any rate the audience was thoroughly enjoying itself, even if it did laugh. And it had plenty of occasion for legitimate laughter in the subsequent acts, between the happy exuberances of Ben Erway's amateur detective and the half-shrewd, half-guileless old lady housekeeper presented so engagingly by Emelie Melville.

It won't do to tell the story. We should never spoil the surprises of the drama, nor tell anything that would cause a let-up on the suspense. Sometimes in discussing a serious play one has to, but with Crimson Alibis the whole point is to keep the audience guessing.

The author, of course, indulges in some trickery; or is disingenuous, to say the least. But in Crimson Alibis that is his inalienable right. And although his play does not purport to be any more than a whiler away of several idle hours, yet he whiles them away entertainingly, the Alcazar company backing him up with youthful zest.

Mr. Ayres is on the stage the greater part of the time, as the Sherlock Holmes of the cast, but Inez Ragan made rather a tardy appearance in the emotional rôle selected for her. Stage authors, by the way, should never omit such little points as this: A few minutes before the arrest of her man the tenderly devoted Mary hands over $700 to him, that he may escape. Rather a fat wad, it struck me. for Larry to absorb, even in these h. c. l. days. When they arrested Larry I found that $700 very much on my mind, and felt an uneasy desire to see it handed back to its rightful owner. And so, I do not doubt, did lots of fellow-spectators. Funny, isn't it, that half-detached, half-illusioned state of mind of even so sophisticated an observer as a professional reviewer.

The author is pretty cute about keeping his dozen characters to the fore, and it is rather amusing in the last act to note the workings out of his device to give each one a little try at the emotional spotlight.

The extreme benevolence of his attitude, however, rather went beyond limits when Sherlock said, magisterially, to the guilty one, "And no American jury would convict you." Whereupon the guilty one took his hat, with a relieved air, and prepared to march off with the released ones.

The company did so well that one does not need to particularize, except in the case of the new man, Murray F. Barnard, who was very satisfactory in the rôle of the next-morning young roysterer who doesn't know whether or not he did the deed in a state of alcoholic frenzy.

THE BOHEMIAN CLUB CONCERT.

The Bohemian Club concert began quite conventionally with the Bach-Gounod "Ave Maria," Messrs. Rudolph Seiger, J. R. Gallet, Uda Waldrop, and Ulderico Marcelli attending respectively to the violin, the harp, the organ, and the leadership. In spite of its expectancy in regard to original contributions from club members, the audience enjoyed the number thoroughly; and then settled down to listen to Eugene Blanchard's Prelude to "When the Nile Flows to Athens." This composition was a revival, to the friends of the members, of music already heard and passed on. But this Orientally-colored composition, with its soothingly sweet beginning developing into the sustained flow of a faded river, upon whose hosom is reflected the rich and varied drama of life, proved to be a most fortunate selection for a revival of a past but unforgotten success.

Following this came a later revival: two

Garden Facts and Figures

"I love flowers," said a householder, "but I can not afford to pay a big water bill. What chance have I to cultivate my little garden?"

"An excellent chance," answered the garden expert in our Service Department. He offered the following proof:

Three cubic feet per square yard per month is the most water you should use during this, the growing season.

You say your garden space is 70 square yards?

Then your monthly use of garden water should be 3x70, or roughly, 200 cubic feet.

How to measure the water? That's simple.

Suppose you use a half-inch hose with a nozzle. Such a hose delivers about one cubic foot of water a minute.

So you have 200 minutes a month in which to use 200 cubic feet of water.

If you play the hose for ten minutes at a time, that gives you twenty waterings a month.

Ten minutes at a time is ample for your garden. And twenty waterings a month are more than ample.

Especially if you dig as well as water, and do your sprinkling at sundown.

Follow these directions, and your love of flowers will cost you just 48 cents a month for water.

"Good!" said the householder; "I shall cultivate my little garden."

selections from Domenico Brescia's Grove Play "Life" (1919); one the Preamble, which seemed to the uninitiated to express youth's expectancy and life's undertones and overtones. The "Flower Dance" and "Finale" was full of gayety blended with dreamfulness that real dance music should express. Perhaps there was something of an effort perceptible in its more showy passages, but the finale, with its suggestion of strength and sincerity, left an excellent impression.

Three very good selections from two of his operas were Henry Hadley's contribution to the programme. Each composer led the orchestra that rendered his own composition, and Mr. Hadley's experience as a leader told immediately in the smoothness and finish of the concerted playing, and greater unity of tone.

There is considerable virtuosity evident in Mr. Hadley's compositions. His ample experience tells here, also, for he knows well the resources of orchestral music. His music is characterized more by finish and conventional adherence than originality, but nevertheless he has good reason to be proud of all three of the selections presented.

The Grove Play of 1920, entitled "Ilya of Murom," composed by Mr. Ulderico Marcelli, was represented in eight selections given both vocally and instrumentally. The Prelude and Lament were a striking harmonious blend of the sorrow of the crippled Ilya with the woodland joy of the peasants. Mr. Marcelli is very much of a modernist in style, and these varied compositions—religious, demoniac, funereal—showed a wide range of dramatic expression. The youth and temperament of the young composer tell in his music, which has much individuality.

A fine male chorus assisted the orchestra in rendering these selections, and with Mr. Wallace Sahin at the organ the group led up to an imposing Finale. There did not seem to be quite enough woe in the Funeral March, but it was, all the same, a fine spectacular example of elegiac composition.

There were some enjoyable vocal solos on the programme contributed by the young tenor Mr. Harry Robertson, whose voice is very pleasing and who sang his French songs with French grace, but whose French accent needs mending. Mr. Robertson also rendered songs of romantic longing very prettily.

JOSEPHINE HART PHELPS.

FOYER AND BOX-OFFICE.

The Columbia Theatre.

The management of the Columbia announces the first local presentation on next Monday evening, August 16th, of California's playwright, Maude Fulton, who will appear at the head of what appears to be a splendid cast in her newest play, "The Humming Bird."

Miss Fulton, who appears in the double rôle of author and star, has conceived a drama of the regeneration of the French Apache, through the united influence of patriotism and a rather deftly conceived love affair.

Miss Fulton is seen as Toinette, the girl of Montmartre, and has incorporated the same elfin charm which made her "Brat" so effective a figure before the footlights and later on the silver sheet.

In the cast which Oliver Morosco has selected will be found several names which command instant attention, including that of Henry B. Walthall, the distinguished screen star, who will make his legitimate stage debut before a San Francisco audience on Monday evening.

Others in the surrounding company are Harlan Tucker, Marie Walcamp, Arthur Stewart Hull, Grace Travers, Paisley Noon, Ernest Anderson, Leah Penman, Florence Oberle, Frank Whitson, and Mildred Cates. All in all, the engagement promises to be one of the most interesting of the early season.

The Curran Theatre.

Coming to the Curran Sunday night for a limited engagement is "The Satires of 1920," the stellar vehicle of Fanchon and Marco for the 1920-21 season. Miss Eva Clark is the prima donna and Arthur West, Al Wohlman, Lloyd and Wells, and John Sheehan are the comedians. The hook of the piece is by Jean Havez, whose work for Ziegfeld's Follies is famed, and the costumes are the creations of Lester of Chicago. The super revue has a definite plot and is a satirization of the motion-picture industry.

The Orpheum.

An unusual vaudeville bill, headed by Singer's Midgets in their new enlarged act of ten scenes and one hour's duration, is the Orpheum attraction to open Sunday afternoon.

Thirty tiny men and women, twenty ponies, three midget elephants, fifteen hunting dogs, numerous other animals, and three carloads of scenic and electrical effects now are included in Singer's Midgets' newest vaudeville presentation.

Every variety of entertainment from the Wild West ring to the fashion forum will be delineated by these remarkable vest-pocket personages, it is declared. They qualify as artists, regardless of their minuteness.

An interesting bill accompanies the midgets. Georgia Campbell and the team of Dooley and Storey, both of this week, further augment the approaching Orpheum offering.

Newcomers will be Raymond Wylie and company in "The Futuristic Jail-Bird"; Roy La Pearl, the noted aerialist, with his company; "Sassy" Lillian Gonne and Bert Alhert, depicting old-time school days; Misses Shaw and Campbell in an artistic musical act; and Willa and Harold Browne, who create "rag pictures" of extreme heaviness from stray hits of cloth. Topics of the Day and the Orpheum Orchestra are standard features, always found at the Orpheum.

The Alcazar Theatre.

The Alcazar is having a wonderful summer season. There was never a time in its history when greater variety of widely contrasting dramatic successes were presented in rapid weekly succession. The acting company never included more popular, versatile, high quality players. The skillful arrangement of plays exerts universal appeal to theatre-goers who want constant variety. From this week's thrilling entanglements of "The Crimson Alihi" there follows next Sunday vivid contrast in "Why Marry?" the satirical comedy of marriage and divorce by Jesse Lynch Williams. "Why Marry?" is the recital of week-end happenings at a fashionable house party, where family problems of expedient marriage and get-relief-quick divorce find startling solution. The persons involved are Dudley Ayres and Inez Ragan, as the idealistic young scientists, madly in love and defiant of public opinion; Henry Shumer, as the philosophical judge; Brady Kline, Gladys Emmons, and Ben Erway, as social climbers; Frederick Green, as the hatter, and Al Cunningham, as the well-intentioned clergyman who can not stifle his conscience.

Revival of "Peg o' My Heart" for the week of August 22d becomes a necessity to satisfy the demands of thousands away on vacation or unable to secure seats during the phenomenal engagement of a month ago. The Alcazar's presentation of this romance has never been surpassed.

AMERICA HAS LARGEST CAVES.

None of the peculiar formations of the earth are more interesting than caves, and many are the adventures that have been had by the explorers of these often mysterious caverns. The very word "cave" seems to have a strong attraction for everybody. Some of the best and most interesting stories have been written about adventures in caves, so they have always been well advertised on our library shelves. And then we must remember that caves were the only homes of many people who lived in the undiscovered parts of the world thousands of years ago, and this in itself adds much historical interest to these natural tunnels under the surface of the earth.

So far as is now known, the United States can lay claim to having the largest caves in the world, and first among these is, naturally, Mammoth Cave, Kentucky. It is only about eighty-five miles from Louisville. Upon visiting its depths it is easy to see how the word mammoth is coupled with its natural name, for parts of it have been explored for a distance of over 150 miles and maps made so that the guides themselves can not get lost. The main body of the cave is only about three miles long, yet parts of this section furnish the famous halls and domes, some of which are 175 feet wide and 125 feet high.

This great cavern has many small lakes and rivers, the best known of these being Echo River, which reverberates an echo to an untold distance, repeating the sound of your voice until only a whisper is heard at the last. The fish in this and the other bodies of water are white and have no eyes. There are also crickets, bats, flies, beetles, spiders, and other queer blind creatures to be found here, and it is interesting to watch them when they are taken out into the light. Being blind, their movements are quite slow and cautious when compared to their kind that live out in the open. In taking a hike through this world's largest cave the guides light up the way so that many beautiful things can be seen, such as the Star Chamber, where the lofty ceiling is studded with snowy crystals that glisten like diamonds. When white men first discovered Mammoth Cave they found many stone arrowheads, pieces of torches, and other relics which indicated that it had once been a meeting place for the Indians, and for all we know countless numbers of war dances may have taken place in the famous Star Chamber just mentioned.

Wyandotte Cave is another one of our great caverns and ranks next to Mammoth Cave in both size and interest. It is in Crawford County, Indiana, and so far has been explored for more than twenty-three miles. In its depths are found many formations similar to those of its bigger sister, one of the chambers being 200 feet high and 300 feet broad. The temperature and moisture in the air are so even that you can walk a great distance without feeling the least fatigue until coming out into the open once more. But if you happen to be one of those few folks who do not indulge in hikes you'll certainly feel the results of the long walk after sitting around for a few minutes.

Distinguished literary men are just like ordinary folk after all. They do not live in a cloud of inspiration, and the incentive that people burn under their noses is likely to choke them. Mark Twain once told a hysterical admirer that he had writer's cramp early in his career. When asked what he took for it he answered, "Beefsteak." Samuel Johnson, although not an ordinary man in any of his ideas or habits, took a very commonplace view of his profession. He said that a man was a fool to write for anything but money, and when asked if he did not like to write he answered that it is not pleasant to write, but it is pleasant to have written. An inquisitive woman was once talking with James Whitcomb Riley about the poor material reward that comes to poets. "But, Mr. Riley," she said, "you have no cause for complaint. You must be a very rich man. I understand that you get a dollar a word for all you write." "Yes, madam," said Riley, with his slow drawl, "but sometimes I sit all day and can't think of a single word."

Beethoven's music is the rage in London and France and German economic delegates are busy reestablishing commercial relations.

VANITY FAIR.

There is hope for those whose years are ruthlessly betrayed by the wrinkles on their faces. A Parisian surgeon has achieved the seemingly impossible, turned back the hands upon the dials of time and effected at least the semblance of rejuvenation. The miracle was worked upon the face of a woman of forty-nine. Hers was a countenance, not only of wrinkles, but of what must be called haginess. We all know the kind. The modus operandi was to make a long incision in the skin, draw it tightly over the shrunken flesh, remove the superfluous cuticle, and stitch the edges firmly and neatly together. The sailor would describe it as taking a reef, and the results are said to be eminently satisfactory. The woman of forty-nine has recovered the face of twenty-five. No wonder she is jubilant, but it is a very great wonder that she should publish her experiences. These things are usually concealed. We do not usually boast that we have cheated time. On the contrary we hustle time into a corner and persuade or coerce him into holding his babbling tongue.

None the less it seems that there is a fly in the ointment. Something must be paid for beautification and rejuvenation. The lady admits that she is "just crazy with joy." Where is the lady of forty-nine who would not be?

"ROUGH IN" FOR HEATING NOW

Purchase Appliances Later

Home-builders are urged to consider the advisability and economy of "roughing in" for heating appliances during building construction, even if necessary to postpone the purchase of appliances till later in the year.

To insure satisfactory results you may proceed upon a definite plan for your heating equipment. We are in a position to give you valuable assistance in laying out and supervising the preliminary work as it progresses.

There is no guesswork in our estimate of your heating requirements. Our trained men KNOW. They are prepared to furnish reliable information regarding individual heating units or a complete plant as your special needs demand. They are strictly charged to advise you only to your best interests.

If gas heating equipment is installed in accordance with our recommendations and specifications, our unqualified guarantee of satisfaction goes with it.

You may well leave your heating problems with us.

But she must not show her joy in the usual way. She must not laugh. She must not even smile. Needless to add that she must not cry. Probably she does not want to cry, although one would think that a prohibition of laughter would be equivalent to an incitement to tears. The ravages inflicted upon the feminine countenance are due, it seems, to laughing and crying. The old adage, "Weep no more, ladies," becomes hygienic as well as sentimental, but it must be supplemented by a similar injunction against laughing. "I daren't smile or cry," says the Paris beauty. "That would start the wrinkles all over again. I should never have needed the operation if I hadn't gone round laughing and weeping all my life."

It seems a pity that laughing should be banned, that it should thus be pilloried as the enemy of feminine beauty. There seems a good deal to laugh at just now, even though the laughter be of the cynical variety. We wonder why the lady laughed so much, and also why she cried so much. It is easy to have an excess of either. Was it not said that the laughter of fools is like the crackling of thorns under a pot. There are tears and laughter that are only skin deep.

The New York Times permits itself to discuss this world-shaking event in its editorial columns. What, it asks, is beauty? Portrait painters revel in lines, wrinkles and crows'-feet, but a non-artistic world, and particularly its male portion, is supposed to abhor them. But does man really abhor them? There are so many current fictions about the male taste. It is supposed to favor a fashionable attire for women, but that it does nothing of the kind is one of the things that every man knows. Men would rather have laughter and wrinkles than no laughter and no wrinkles, always provided that the laughter is of a tolerable kind. Says the editorial writer in the Times:

"And the gayety he loves is not that which springs from the sense of personal and selfish well-being, but from sympathy and from a genuine joy in the human comedy. No man who has ever felt the delight of whole-souled, humorous comradeship can have anything but love and reverence for the lines it leaves—even wrinkles and crows'-feet. And then there is the matter of tears. Men, it is said, hate tears. They do; but only of a certain kind—the kind of which one suspects the Parisian lady to have been guilty. In the whole scope of a man's nature there is probably no emotion so strong as that which is evoked by tears of genuine grief in his womenfolk."

"So one sees what a creature is man, how noble in reason, in action how like an angel, in apprehension how like a god! If he had his own way there would be no Midnight Frolics and Follies, no Winter Garden. Like Hamlet, he scorns all who, God having given them one face, make themselves another. If he acknowledges any other mood, it can be only the result of that mouthful in the Garden of Eden, which he never would have thought of eating if only the woman whom he revered, and so mistakenly trusted, had not tempted him."

The Turkish woman is being emancipated. Almost any man may now look upon her face and live. She still wears the yashmak, but she wears it very much as she wears her appendix, as a sort of record of obsolete functions. She throws it back and exposes her countenance. And a very pleasing countenance it often is.

There has always been a good deal of humbug about the yashmak anyway. Mohammedan law says that the face of the woman must be covered, but it does not say what with. It does not prescribe the opacity of the veil, and some of the veils were of the finest muslin and nearly as transparent as glass. Women of the poorer class were not able to afford the finer materials, and with them the yashmak was often a real veil. You could see nothing of the face and were left to speculate as to its beauty. Elderly women and women who were not beautiful were apt to favor the denser materials and to hope for a favorable guess, but the actual beauties were not disposed to leave anything at all to guesswork. Even the changes of expression could be discerned through the yashmak.

It is the war that has done the miracle.

The Turkish women had to do the work of the men, and there were many kinds of work that could not be done while wearing the yashmak. Turkish opinion strongly disapproved of women working in the telephone exchange, but the women took the matter into their own hands. They needed the money for one thing, so they threw away the yashmak and went to work. Other Turkish women who had to work in the fields found their labor unheatable if they retained the yashmak, so they discarded it. The religious authorities remonstrated and threatened, but it made no difference. Why even in America there have been cases of feminine rebellion against the dictates of convention. It was observed also that the Turkish women were showing laxity in other respects. They rode freely in public conveyances, and they were not so careful as of yore in drawing the curtains that were intended to hide them from the public gaze.

With jade for ornaments increasing in price from five to six times what it was previous to the great war, it is interesting to know that the largest known hock of jade in existence is in the American Museum of Natural History in New York City (says an article in the New York Times). The big stone looks to the average observer to be about as large as that famous piece of rock they keep under an elaborate arch at Plymouth, Massachusetts, the famous Plymouth Rock upon which the Pilgrims landed. Its actual size is seven feet in length by four in width and its weight is three tons.

The Museum's block of jade does not look unlike the Plymouth Rock, for while jade always suggests a beautifully polished green, or perhaps white stone, this, being in the rough, looks very much like any other boulder.

While the big piece of jade is one of the museum's great curiosities it is not, as might be supposed, in a conspicuous place, say in the big central hall of the museum on the main floor. This is because it is used as a part of an anthropological exhibit and on it is poised a Maori warrior, life size, in an attitude suggestive of a war dance, with a knife poised in an upraised hand.

The warrior is an interesting person himself. He is in native costume, which consists of tattooing on the face and the upper part of the legs and a breech cloth. The model was cast from life. The original was Hautuoterangi, a Maori dancer, who was one of a troupe brought to this country a few years ago to perform at the Hippodrome. The statue was the work of Sigurd Neandross, and in the difficult pose in which it is done is considered one of the finest and most realistic figures of this kind in the museum.

Monsieur Hautuoterangi is poised upon the block of jade because that stone is found in very considerable quantities in New Zealand and is prized by the Maoris both as an article of value and also as a lucky stone. Besides making ornaments and charms of the jade, the Maoris carved axe-shaped implements from it, drilled at the upper ends, and carried by their chiefs as badges of office.

The greater part of New Zealand jade is found on the western coast of South Island in boulders which usually appear in mountain streams. This big block of jade was found on South Island in 1902. It is of the green variety, none of the white jade being found in New Zealand, and the interior ranges from apple green to the richest tones of emerald. The outer surfaces are subject to change and, like this great houlder, are a subtranslucent brown or yellow brown.

Jade is usually considered one of the hardest of stones. It is not, however, actually as hard as quartz, but it is a tough stone and requires much more effort in shaping and polishing than either quartz or agate.

There was no such place as Beacon, New York, at the time of the 1910 census, but now the city of that name reports a population of 10,996. The explanation is that in 1913 Fishkill Landing and Matteawan were incorporated under the new designation. Fishkill Landing, on the other hand, has a familiar sound in Providence. It was the western goal of the organizers of the Providence, Hartford and Fishkill Railroad of more than half a century ago—a road that afterwards became the Hartford, Providence and Fishkill, and later successively a part of the Boston, Hartford and Erie, the New York and New England, the New England and the New York, New Haven and Hartford. The history of the 200-mile stretch of track from Providence to Beacon thus fairly epitomizes the history of railroad change and consolidation in the United States as a whole during the last two generations.—Providence Journal.

A professorship in the history of the United States has been urged for the University of Oxford by Lord Rothermere, who has offered £20,000 for the endowment.

Grave and Gay, Epigrammatic and Otherwise.

To Kipling an American once wrote: "Hearing that you are retailing literature at $1 a word, I enclose $1 for a sample." Mr. Kipling complied with "Thanks" and kept the dollar. Two weeks later the American wrote, "Sold the 'Thanks' anecdote for $2. Enclosed please find 46 cents in stamps, being half the profits on the transaction, less the postage."

Titus Titmouse was infuriated, but the editor of the Western Wind shut him up in two seconds. "Is this the newspaper office?" inquired Mr. Titmouse. "It is," responded the man at the desk. "Didn't this paper say I was a liar?" "It did not." "Didn't it say I was a scoundrel?" "It did not." "Well, some paper said it." "Possibly it was our contemporary down the street," suggested the editor, as he picked up a paperweight. "This paper never prints stale news."

"Most of the remedies for the social unrest—and the social unrest is a very deep and menacing thing—most of the remedies for it remind me forcibly of little Johnny Jones. Johnny Jones, you know, was studying botany, and he declared that he had an infallible way to tell the difference between mushrooms and toadstools. 'When you git vi'lent spasms,' said little Johnny, 'with cramps, swellin' of the feet, and partial loss of vision endin' in insanity and death—then it aint mushrooms.'"

Shortly after the arrival of the professional play producer a young amateur came up and, much to his annoyance, began to tell him what to do. "I must have a part to suit me," he said. "I am always one of the principals in our productions, and I'm usually a big success." "You must allow me to be the best judge of a suitable cast," was the dry reply. A few days later, at rehearsal, the cast chosen was read out, and the name of the budding Irving was omitted. "Why am I not given a part?" he asked in a great rage. "You have not been overlooked," the great man replied with dignity. "You are to be the first onion in the market scene."

For sheer loyalty, at once to truth and to home industries, the palm belongs to the oldest inhabitant in a small Illinois town where the noon hour found a tourist waiting for a train. He stopped the old-timer to inquire where he could obtain a meal. "There be two restrants," was the answer, "down 'round the corner, one on this side of the street, and th' other acrost from it, and," he added, with a twinkle in his eye, "if y' go to one you'll wish y'd gone t' th' other."

A recently discharged soldier, who had unpleasant memories of his military experience, took the first opportunity after resuming his civilian clothes to write to his former colonel: "Sir—After what I have suffered for the last two years, it gives me much pleasure to tell you and the army to go to hell, a place to which only the wicked are consigned." In due course he got his reply: "Sir—Any suggestion or inquiries concerning the movement of troops must be entered on army form 2132, a copy of which I enclose."

Cornelius Vanderbilt, supping recently in a fashionable New York restaurant, gazed with critical admiration at the beautiful young women all around him. Most of them wore the new and striking type of décolleté gowns Paris has recently invented, sleeveless affairs, cut under the arms like the jersey of a young athlete. "I suppose," he mused, "that when a young woman is very beautiful she should wear these things, and yet," and he smiled: "She reminds me of the prophet. Not much on her in her own country."

Blasco Ibañez, the Spanish novelist, was talking in New York about the cubists. "I know a cubist in Madrid," he said, "who paints portraits that look like eggs, chairs, bottles, rocks—anything but the models they are painted from. I dropped in on this cubist in his studio one morning, and found him examining with low, troubled oaths some twenty or thirty of his masterpieces. 'What's the matter, old man?' I said. 'The matter is,' said he, 'that Don Mucho Denarom, the oil profiteer, has just sent around for his portrait, and to save my life I can't remember which it is.'"

A clerk in the employ of a Chicago business man, while a fair worker, is yet an individual of pronounced eccentricity. One day a wire basket fell on the top of the clerk's desk and scratched his cheek. Not having any court plaster at hand, he slapped on three 2-cent postage stamps and continued his work. A few minutes later he had occasion to take some papers to his employer's private office. When he entered the "old man," observing the postage stamps on the clerk's cheek, fixed him with an astonished stare. "Look here, Tom!" he exclaimed. "You are carrying too much postage for second-class matter."

During the recent epidemic for naming old-established spots after the new heroes brought into being by the great war Charles M. Schwab was called upon to speak at one of the rechristening exercises. He mentioned how appropriate the new name was and then said: "This occasion reminds me of another I attended several years ago. It was on the frontier and the citizens had gathered to give their little town a nice big name. Suddenly a voice boomed from the back of the crowd: 'Gentlemen, I move we name this here burg Old Glory.' 'Why'n tarnation do yuh want caller that?' demanded the chairman, reaching for his gun. 'Waal,' answered the man with the hunch, 'she aint never goin' to be nothin' but a flag station.'"

Since her husband had become a government contractor Mrs. Newton had put on no end of style. Recently she gave a reception and thought to impress her guests by having the gardener in to help at table. He managed fairly well except for spilling the tea on the frock of the doctor's wife and treading on the vicar's pet corn. But he got tired of offering thin bread and butter to one old lady. At the seventh trip he bent down and advised in husky tones, which rang through the room: "If ye was to slap two or three pieces together, ma'am, mebbe you'd get a mouthful."

The American tourist had hustled through England, Wales, and part of Scotland in a few days. Now he was visiting Loch Lomond with its "bonny, bonny banks," a guidebook in one hand and a time-table in the other. In these days of cinema wonders it's strange that Americans ever bother to go abroad. They could "see it in the pictures." A local worthy was acting as a guide, and his face fell when the visitor remarked candidly that they possessed many much finer "beauty spots" in the states. "Ha'e ye?" remarked the son of Scotia coldly. "Ah, weel, jist ye come away, tae the tap o' this hill, an' Ah'll show ye something ye havenna' got in Ameriky." After a laborious climb, the pair reached the summit. Then the guide recommended the American just to turn round slowly and view the landscape o'er. During the process he called the tourist's attention to a number of large buildings in different directions. "Waal, what are they?" asked the bored visitor. "Distcleeries!" replied the Scot in savage triumph. "An' all wurkin'."

If I were a hotel waiter
And you were a manicure
What bounty of fate were greater?
We'd go to the best the-yater
With seats from a speculator,
And never again be poor,
If I were a hotel waiter
And you were a manicure!

If I were a taxi pirate
And you were a waitress fair,
We'd never again be irate
When living attained a big rate;
In the giddiest whirl we'd gyrate
With never a fret or care,
If I were a taxi pirate
And you were a waitress fair.

If I were a master plumber
And you were a check-room pest,
Our town bouse would be a bummer,
We'd live at the shore in summer;
While now—one must be a slummer
To get to our little nest.
Ah, were I a wealthy plumber
And you but a check-room pest!

If I were a garment cutter
And you were a lady's maid,
At prices we'd never mutter,
In satins and silks you'd flutter,
And we could have milk and butter
And eggs that were newly laid,
If I were a garment cutter
And you were a lady's maid!

But since I'm a versifier
And you're on a magazine,
I've gone and I've bocked my lyre,
Our larder grows daily shyer,
And we have no luxury higher
Than oleomargarine!
For I am a versifier
And you're on a magazine.

Let others delight in the aeroplane's flight
High over the clouds that are fleecy and white;
Or get a big car and go speeding afar
Where silvery daisies the green meadows star;
Or gallop away on a roan or a bay
On roads where the boofs a wild symphony play.
No envy disturbs my enjoyment serene,
Contented I pilot my little machine.

When the shadows are long and the cricket's shrill song
Is beard, and the beetles are playing ping-pong,
I push it with ease while enjoying the breeze,
The scent of the roses, the drone of the bees.

I've no tires to replace, fear no fall out of space,
With lawn-mower I am a conquering ace.
My lawn is like velvet, though small is its measure,
For mowing the grass is my principal pleasure.

Sawdust Latest Source of Sugar.

Get your sweet tooth ready, and then prepare to be disappointed. Sugar can be made from sawdust. Every sawmill's refuse heap is a mine of sweetness.

Now comes the sad part of the story. It's not the kind of sugar you know at all, but a different kind, that you can not use to sweeten your coffee.

The announcement has been made that sugar in immense quantities can be made from sawdust. But this ray of hope in the days of 30 cents a pound sugar is a false alarm, for the sugar that is produced is not the table sugar of commerce, not the cane or beet sugar, but is glucose, an entirely different substance, and not a chance is there of the sawdust pile relieving the famine in sugar.

This is the announcement of the New York State College of Forestry at Syracuse in explanation of the recent announcements that sawdust contains sugar, the explanation being given by Dr. Louis E. Wise, professor of forest chemistry and an authority on the chemistry of wood. He says:

"An important sugar can be prepared from sawdust by hydrolysis with acid, but it must not be confused with the sugar of the breakfast table. This sugar, prepared from wood, is dextrose or glucose and is identical with the sugar obtained by acid treatment of starch. The sugar is not identical, however, with sucrose, commonly termed 'cane sugar' or 'beet sugar.' Glucose is, however, widely used commercially and is an important food-stuff. It is the principal component of corn syrups and the like, and has distinct nutritive value. As sucrose can not be prepared from glucose, either commercially or in the laboratory, there is little prospect that such a synthesis will be an accomplished fact in the near future.

"The commercial production of glucose from sawdust or other sources probably merits thorough investigation. On the other hand, it should be clearly understood that glucose is not cane sugar, and that the term 'sugar' as commonly used by the layman refers to sucrose or cane sugar. There are many sugars. In fact they comprise a most important group of organic compounds, and different species of trees have produced different sugars."

Almost half of the 800 square miles of territory devastated in France are again being cultivated. The trenches and shell-holes are being rapidly filled in and 12,000,000 square yards of barbed wire have been removed. One-third of the 25,000 damaged homes have been entirely repaired and 230 of the 12,000 factories which were demolished are again producing.

Several Canadian motion-picture companies have been organized to compete with film concerns which export considerably to Canada.

Music's Effect on Animals.

From time to time investigations have been made in order to ascertain whether the legend of Orpheus, the wondrous music of whose lyre enthralled the wild beasts of the forests, rests upon a fact. Cornish, at the London Zoological Gardens, endeavored to discover by experiment what effect music would have upon the creatures there in captivity. With him went a musical friend, who played on the violin to insects, reptiles, birds, and beasts.

The tarantulas listened, or did not listen, unmoved and sulky. They whose hite is said in fable to cause others to dance refused to dance themselves. Not so the scorpions. After a few notes had been played they became agitated and writhed and danced tumultuously, their excitement increasing with every crescendo and decreasing with every diminuendo.

In the reptiles' cages more marked effects were seen. The monitor lizard listened and swayed. Black snakes were attentive and started up and hissed. A boa crept as close as possible to the instrument and seemed enraptured.

But of all the snakes, the cobra is reputed to be the most susceptible to music, and the specimen experimented on at the zoo did not helie its fame. On hearing the violin it raised itself in the traditional attitude on its tail and spread its hood gently, swaying to and fro tue while.

The first quadrupeds to which the violin was played were polar and grizzly bears, which manifested much pleasure and stood up at the front of the cages to listen. The wolves snarled and cowered in fear at the sound of the violin, with their tails between their legs, hair hristling and hodies quivering in spasms of fright. The same results were noted in the case of jackals and foxes. The sheep, naturally enough, found much pleasure in that which frightened the wolves. So did the wild hogs, the hisons, and the zehras.

The elephant did not care for the music, but snorted and whistled with rage. The monkeys displayed a critical diversity of sentiment. Some listened eagerly with nods and gestures of appreciation, while others scowled and turned away in disgust.

Further experiments were made on the various animals with other instruments, especially with the piccolo and the flute. As a rule, the shrill notes of the piccolo annoyed, frightened, or enraged the animals, while the softer tones of the flute soothed and pleased them.

"May I ask if you have made up your mind to stay in?" asked the young husband, after the domestic tiff. "No," she replied firmly. "I have made up my face to go out."—London Telegraph.

"Tin Whistles."

The War Department announces that it has conferred the Distinguished Service Cross on General Peyton C. March, the chief of staff. Nobody begrudges to General March any acknowledgment that may be due to personal or military merit, none the less it is to be remembered that the Distinguished Service Cross is a decoration awarded only for gallantry in action. A Distinguished Service Medal, quite another thing, is designed for those who have distinguished themselves in war otherwise than in action. General March had previously received the Medal, as have a great number of persons in and out of military employ for non-fighting service during the war. Both decorations are of recent creation, having been provided by Congress toward the end of the war in Europe.

To find a justifying feat of battle gallantry in General March's career the War Department had to go back to the days of the Spanish war and the Philippine insurrection. The award is made "for gallant conduct while serving as a first lieutenant of the Astor Battery in the Philippine Islands." It is evident that Secretary Baker will see to it before he goes out of office that General March shall be hung with every form of decoration within the authority of the department. He has everything now except the Medal of Honor, and not even the Secretary of War can assemble a board of officers to make the recommendation necessary for that particular bestowal.

The practice of making awards of battle decorations long after the event is not an innovation. For example, it was not until March, 1898, during the administration of President McKinley, that Leonard Wood received his Medal of Honor "for distinguished conduct in the campaign against Apache Indians, 1886." Likewise it was not until he had become a prominent member of the Committee on Military affairs during the Roosevelt administration that Senator Warren, father-in-law of General Pershing, was awarded the Medal of Honor for gallantry on the battlefield at the siege of Fort Hudson during the civil war.

This whole business of decorations seems trivial enough. Yet it is to be remembered that since time out of mind governments have rewarded special merit by these means. When one of Napoleon's aides referred to a decoration as a "tin whistle," the emperor's reply was: "Have you yet to learn that the world is ruled by tin whistles?"

Governmental Finance—With an Eye to the Campaign.

On Tuesday, August 3d, the Associated Press sent out from its Washington office the following dispatch:

The gross national debt was reduced a total of $76,404,453 during July, according to the treasury statement today. This leaves the public debt at $24,222,917,013. The reduction was accomplished through the retirement of that amount of treasury certificates of indebtedness.

The information embodied in this dispatch was very obviously given out by the Treasury Department with intent to impress the country with the idea that the public debt is being reduced. It may easily be believed that this gratifying statement was especially designed to nullify criticism of continued extravagance and waste of public funds at the hands of the Administration to the end of wringing favor and support for the party and the candidates with which the Administration is affiliated. It will be remembered that upon the heels of Governor Cox's acceptance of President Wilson's programme in the matter of the league of nations it was announced that the Administration would "put behind" Mr. Cox all the forces at its command. It was very obviously in pursuance of this bargain that the dispatch, so helpful to the Democratic cause, was given to the public.

A few days after the giving out of this statement—five to be exact—allowing time for the country to be impressed with the idea that the national debt is being reduced—the Secretary of the Treasury made a public announcement offering for subscription at par with accrued interest at First Federal Reserve banks, treasury certificates dated and bearing interest from August 16, 1920, payable August 16, 1921, with interest at the rate of 6 per cent., the certificates to be free of all taxes up to the sum of $5000. Here we have an Administration boasting of a reduction of $76,404,453 in the public debt, immediately followed by an increase in the public debt of $150,000,000. It is a case where comment would seem to be superfluous.

In his speech of acceptance Governor Cox denounced the Republican party in control of Congress for its failure to reduce taxation—this in the face of the fact that former Secretary Glass and the present Secretary Houston of the Treasury Department are on record as advising Congress that any attempt to reduce taxes would be disastrous to the national resources. Now comes Franklin D. Roosevelt in his speech of acceptance, denouncing Congress as stingy and shortsighted in limiting appropriations for the executive departments. Thus from various Democratic mouths the Republican Congress is condemned (1) for not having reduced taxes and (2) for not being more liberal in its appropriations of money. The want of logic in this series of condemnations is on a par with the want of honesty that represents the Administration as paying off the national debt, when as a matter of fact it is steadily adding to it.

The mess into which the government finances have been plunged is indicated by the fact that Secretary Houston finds himself obliged to pay 6 per cent. on the new short-term notes aggregating $150,000,000. This rate is unprecedented in time of peace, and when it is considered that the notes are tax-free for the small investor, 6 per cent. becomes truly a prodigious rate for a government loan at a time void of emergency. Another interesting feature of the situation is the fact that the Interstate Commerce Commission has been reprimanding the railroads for paying 7 per cent. for money with which to provide themselves with necessary equipment. The commission has declared that 7 per cent. for loans of this character is little short of outrageous. The sharpness of its criticism brought a group of railroad executives to Washington last week with explanation of the utter futility of trying to get money at a lower rate at this time. The soundness of their position is emphasized by the Treasury Department's bid of 6 per cent. on gilt-edged government paper with a tax-free clause.

The Moral Basis of "Policy."

In the course of a report based upon personal visitation of the Pacific Orient, with careful study of financial and other conditions there, Mr. Thomas A. Lamont, the well-known financial authority, makes the pregnant declaration that there are two ways of dealing with Japan—(1) "antagonism," (2) "coöperation." It hardly needs to be added that Mr. Lamont's recommendation is an earnest plea for the method last named. In truth the coöperative idea is entitled to be regarded as a fixed moral obligation, not only in our relations with Japan, but in our dealings with other countries. Among civilized men and countries the coöperative idea is so regarded, none the less because there sometimes come conditions in respect of which the arguments of coöperation must yield to the arguments of force. But before antagonism may legitimately be brought to the service of international diplomacy coöperation is entitled to a full and fair trial. The diplomacy of antagonism as distinct from the diplomacy of coöperation is the employment in international affairs of the spirit, not of the gentleman, but of the bully.

In the immediate situation we may see in striking contrast the brutal principle of antagonism and the humanitarian principle of coöperation. Our self-seeking politicians, our clamorous sensational newspapers, certain unthinking combinations of interest and prejudice are seeking by a hundred sinister means to inflame American sentiment in relation to Japan and to enforce policies, not in themselves wrong, by unworthy means. They would bring the country and the government to an attitude of antagonism towards Japan and all things Japanese, would substitute hate for amity, would supplant good-will by resentment. True, they may not intend to do all this, but the means they are attempting to employ must inevitably lead to a breach between the two countries, out of reason, fatal to mutual interest, morally harmful to both.

Most intelligent and disinterested men, we believe, recognize the fact that there are differences between the two races that render anything like close domestic relations impracticable and undesirable. By many devices nature has put limits upon association of the Eastern and Western worlds. Considerations of heredity, of mental propensity, of moral perception, all defined and emphasized by differences of color, mark the two peoples and disqualify them for close association.

It is a sound instinct that declines a fusion whose mongrel product could not have the character or the acceptance of the one or the other.

History and circumstances have combined to place the two races each in a habitat to which it is suited and to which it has acquired a prescriptive right. There is no need that either should impinge upon the territories of the other. There are many obvious reasons why each should, broadly speaking, hold to itself, preserving its racial standards and the civilization that is the product of its spirit and its environment. There ought to be no movement of a large kind from America to Japan. By the same token there should be no large movement from Japan to America. Just as one is brown man's country so the other is white man's country. But in holding to the adjustments of history, tradition, and prescription, policies of antagonism are neither necessary nor excusable. Individual Japanese find advantages in coming among us, but no national purpose of Japan is involved in this movement. It may be restricted in so far as our judgment and wishes may determine without offense to Japan if we shall go about the business discreetly and in good temper, in the spirit of coöperation as distinct from the spirit of antagonism. In truth Japan, in refusing alienation of her soil, has set an example that we may properly follow. In respecting our Monroe Doctrine she has made a precedent which should be instructive to us in relation to her legitimate ambitions. We have only in our dealings with Japan to accept and employ her own methods of national self-preservation and ambition and thus reinforce the foundations of peace and good-will established between the two countries more than half a century ago.

More Amusing Than Important.

On June 1st a contract of long standing between the Washington branch of the International Jewelers' Union and the well-known establishment of Galt & Bro. expired by limitation. The union submitted a new contract calling for a 20 per cent. wage advance and the observance of certain new and pretty stiff conditions. Galt & Bro. professed willingness to grant the wage demand, but declined to accede to the proposed shop rules, refusing to sign the contract and announcing that hereafter the firm would carry on the manufacturing part of the business on an open-shop basis. As expressed by union officials Galt & Bro. "repudiated the idea of collective bargaining and declined further dealings with the union." The upshot of the matter is that the union has picketed the store of Galt & Bro., along with several other jewelry stores that take the same position as the result of a campaign for the open shop now being conducted at Washington. Every person who enters the store is informed by the picket on the job that "this store is unfair to organized labor."

The management of Galt & Bro. concede that the facts are as above set forth, but it points out that its workmen voluntarily severed their connection with the union some time ago. They also point to the fact that for several years their employees have worked on a profit-sharing basis, watchmakers, engravers, porters, and others receiving a minimum wage plus a proportionate 50 per cent. share of the net profits. The only point in the controversy is the principle of collective bargaining.

Public interest in this relatively small matter rests upon the fact that Galt & Bro. is only another name for Mrs. Edith Bolling Galt Wilson, sole proprietor of Galt & Bro., she having come into the property by inheritance from her late husband, Norman Galt. The amusing fact is that while the distinguished proprietor is being reproached as "disloyal to the principle of collective bargaining," the distinguished proprietor's distinguished husband is on record in many resounding phrases as a supporter of this "sacred" principle.

An Impertinent Proposal.

It will be recalled that the recent labor conference at Washington, affiliated with the league of nations, adopted a resolution to the effect that the governing body of the international labor office (one of the "sections" of the league of nations) should appoint a commission to consider and report "measures to regulate the migration of workers out of their own states and to protect the interests of wage-earners residing in states other than their own." The conference also recommended that "each member of the international labor organization, on terms to be agreed upon by the countries concerned, admit foreign workers (together with their families) employed within its territory to the benefits of its laws and regulations for the protection of its own workers as well as the right of lawful organization as enjoyed by its own workers." It would seem from all this that the league of nations is seeking to establish for itself jurisdiction over all international labor arrangements. The project is not likely to commend itself to the United States, where we have our own ideas in the matter of alien workmen. We shall hardly be willing to transfer this particular phase of sovereignty to a league in which we have only a minor voice. The point gains emphasis by reference to the Japanese issue now before the country. Is there any American who would conceive it to be practicable or wise to refer this issue to the league of nations and tamely submit ourselves to its adjudication? The query answers itself. Not an international labor organization, but the American Congress, will determine the traditions under which Japanese or other foreign workers ("together with their families") shall or shall not be admitted to the country. The project above outlined is only another of many developments going to illustrate the impracticability of endowing an outside organization with powers in relation to what we regard as domestic questions.

Radicalism Rebuked by the Standard Parties.

In Russia radicalism is in the saddle and is riding hard. Elsewhere in Europe it presses upon the established order of things. It has a strong hold upon Germany, broken as that country is by defeat, humiliation, and poverty. It threatens both France and Italy and its murmurings are heard even in conservative England. That it will make conquest of western Europe is not likely, but in the situation there is sufficient cause for uneasy apprehension.

Radicalism has its votaries in America, but recent indications happily tend to assurance rather than to fear. Highly significant was the attitude of the conventions of the great political parties at Chicago and at San Francisco. The politician is perhaps the keenest of practical judges of the temper and disposition of men and times. It speaks much therefore for encouragement that both parties in convention distinctly and promptly repudiated all radical proposals. Radical urgency was not wanting either at Chicago or San Francisco. Its agents openly or in disguise were present at both these great meetings and were eager to enforce expressions friendly or even tolerant of "advanced" ideas. Pressure was employed to this end, but to no effect. In the platform of neither party is there an expression tending to comfort of those elements that would weaken traditional Americanism. On the other hand by positive action both parties repudiated and cast forth suggestions and proposals tending to compromise of essential and recognized principles.

Defeated and disappointed at Chicago and San Francisco, various groups representative of radicalism in its many forms came together a few weeks later and undertook a scheme of political action. It was a flat failure. No sooner were the varied proposals presented than they were found to be as incapable of fusion as oil and water. Combination being out of the question, coöperation was proposed, and here again it was discovered that antagonisms between the various radical groups was too positive for common sympathy, much less for association in political projects.

The American spirit is not quite what it once was. Infusion of alien elements has to a degree weakened the old hardihood of mind. We have let in too many elements of social protest. But as the recent conventions demonstrate, the spirit of the country remains sound—if not everything it once was, at least sufficient to render futile the noisy efforts of the enemies of social order.

America will not "go Red." The spirit in which the republic was founded, and subject to which its great advancement has been won, still abides with us, still dominates our councils, and holds authority in the land.

Editorial Notes.

The manner in which the government does business with private individuals, and the persistence with which each arm or branch of the Federal service visions itself as being a self-contained government of its own, is illustrated in a pamphlet just issued containing a digest of opinions of the judge advocate-general of the army for January. For example:

A contract was made for the manufacture of treenails for the Emergency Fleet Corporation. The contractor entered into a contract with the government for the purchase of merchantable treenail timber on a military reservation and agreed to pay therefor to the United States at the rate of $25 per cord. Under this contract a large amount of merchantable timber was cut and removed, but the contractor has failed to make payment for same. He admits the correctness of the amount claimed as due, but because of the cancellation of his contract by the Emergency Fleet Corporation and his consequent inability to work up all the purchased timber on hand he has refused payment. The claim of the government against the contractor under the War Department contract is not affected by cancellation of his contract with the Emergency Fleet Corporation.

Still more illustrative of the departmental sense of self-sufficiency is the means by which the Secretary of the Navy has been supplying ships and yards with fuel oil from our entrance into the war and up to this time. Despite the constitutional assurance that private property shall not be taken for public use without "full compensation," Secretary Daniels continues to fill the navy tanks with oil for less than commercial prices by threats of force. Just why oil should be taken at less than its market value, while flour, potatoes, and other supplies are paid for at full value does not appear. The department takes upon itself the function of judge, jury, and executioner in the matter of oil supplies with as little regard for the pledge of the Constitution as had Germany for the "scrap of paper" in which her faith was pledged to Belgium. It is all of a piece with President Wilson's assumption in contempt of the Constitution that the making of peace was his private business—that the Senate, for all its constitutional mandate, has no authority in the making of peace that the Executive is bound to respect. It is, we suspect, the President's example that has filled every little bureaucrat with an extravagant sense of his own authority to make rules and regulations having all the force of laws duly enacted. Verily it is time to bring the government back within the limits of the Constitution.

We recall nothing more naïve than Lenine's remark that "America must learn that she can not dump her anorchists upon Russia," unless it be President Wilson's query at Princeton some ten years ago: "How can I democratize this institution unless I have absolute authority?"

The New York City government is not a common agency of reform in municipal practice. Nor would reform naturally be looked for, at the point of saving public money, at the hands of an official bearing a name of such Milesian suggestion as Whalen. None the less Commissioner Grover Whalen of New York has brought into effect an innovation by which approximately one-half of the municipal automobile bill has been saved. Under the old plan each city employee of a certain rank rode about at his pleasure or held in waiting at his convenience or whim a city-owned automobile. Commissioner Whalen has put into effect a system under which officials may use city-owned automobiles only when actually employed in public service. He has devised a procedure under which cars may not be held in waiting while officials cool their heels or otherwise kill time. Under the Whalen plan city employees authorized to use municipal cars must call for them precisely as a citizen may call for a taxicab; and he must release it at the moment its service is not required. Thus many abuses, including that of careless holding of cars and "joy-riding" in general, have been cut out. The scheme works so well that according to an official report in one branch of service five cars do the work formerly done by twenty-five. We are not informed as to Commissioner Whalen's general qualifications, but at least it may be said for him that he has a firm grasp upon one sound principle. Further pertinent is the suggestion that the Whalen method might well be employed in San Francisco, where the use of city-owned machines for services essentially private in character is an open scandal.

Reports are once more current that the passenger pigeon, a species formerly of extraordinary abundance which suddenly disappeared some years ago, has been rediscovered. Four Massachusetts bird hunters have testified to the state ornithologist that they saw at close range and positively identified a pair of supposedly extinct birds.

THE NEW IRISH BILL.

Following is the full text of the measure before Parliament "for restoration and maintenance of order in Ireland":

(1) Where it appears to His Majesty in Council that owing to the existence of a state of disorder in Ireland the ordinary law is inadequate for the prevention and punishment of crime or the maintenance of order His Majesty in Council may issue regulations under the Defense of the Realm Consolidation Act 1914 (hereinafter referred to as the Principal Act) for securing the restoration and maintenance of order in Ireland and as to the powers and duties for that purpose of the Lord Lieutenant and the Chief Secretary and of members of His Majesty's forces and other persons acting on His Majesty's behalf and in particular regulations for the special purpose hereinafter mentioned.

(2) The provisions of the Principal Act with respect to the trial by courts-martial or courts of summary jurisdiction and punishment of persons committing offenses against the Defense of the Realm Regulations shall extend to the trial and punishment of persons who have committed crimes in Ireland whether before or after the passing of this act, including persons committed for trial or against whom indictments have been found so however that:

(a) Any crime when so tried shall be punishable with the punishment assigned to the crime by statute or common law.

(b) A court-martial when trying a person charged with a crime punishable by death shall include as a member of the court one person (who need not be an officer) nominated by the Lord Lieutenant, being a person certified by the Lord Chancellor of Ireland or the Lord Chief Justice of England to be a person of legal knowledge and experience, and regulations under the Principal Act may be made accordingly.

(3) Regulation so made may also

(a) Provide that a court of summary jurisdiction when trying a person charged with a crime or with an offense against the Regulations when hearing and determining any application with respect to recognizance shall, except in the Dublin Metropolitan Police District, be constituted of two or more resident magistrates, and that a court of quarter sessions when hearing and determining an appeal against a conviction of a court of summary jurisdiction for any such crime or offense shall be constituted of the recorder or county court judge sitting alone.

(b) Confer on a court-martial the powers and jurisdiction exercisable by Justices or any other civil court for binding persons to keep the peace or be of good behavior for esteeming and enforcing recognizance and for compelling persons to give evidence and to produce documents before the court.

(c) Confer on persons authorized to summon witnesses before a court-martial the power of issuing warrants for compelling persons to attend as witnesses, and any warrant so issued shall have the like effect and be executed in the like manner as if issued by a justice of court of summary jurisdiction having jurisdiction in the place in which it is executed or sought to be executed.

(d) Authorize the imposition by courts-martial of fines in addition to or in substitution for any other punishments for offenses against the regulations as well as for crimes and provide for the manner in which such fines are to be enforced.

(e) Authorize the conveyance to and detention in any of His Majesty's prisons in any part of the United Kingdom of any persons upon whom a sentence of imprisonment has been passed in Ireland, whether before or after the passing of this act.

(f) Provide for any of the duties of a coroner any coroner's jury, being performed by a court of inquiry constituted under the Army Act instead of by the coroner and jury.

(g) Provide that where the court house or other building in which any court has been usually held is destroyed or rendered unfit for the purpose, the court may be held in such other court house or building as may be directed by the Lord Lieutenant.

(h) Authorize the trial without jury of any action, counter claim, civil bill, issue, cause or matter in the High Court or a County Court in Ireland which apart from this provision would be triable with a jury.

(i) Provide for the retention of sums payable to any local authority from the local taxation (Ireland) account or from any Parliamentary grant or from any fund administered by any government department or public body where the local authority has in any respect refused or failed to perform its duties, or for the purpose of discharging amounts awarded against the local authority in respect of compensation for criminal injuries or other liabilities of the local authorities and for the application of the sums so retained in or towards the purpose aforesaid.

(4) Any such regulations may apply either generally to the whole of Ireland or to any part thereof and may be issued at any time whether before or after the termination of the present war and the Principal Act shall continue in force as far as may be necessary for that purpose and the regulations may contain such incidental, supplemental, and consequential provisions as may be necessary for carrying out the purposes of this act and shall have effect as if enacted in this act.

(5) In this act, unless the context otherwise requires, the expression, crime, means any treason, felony, misdemeanor or other offense punishable whether by indictment or on summary conviction by imprisonment or by any greater punishment and other offenses against the Defense of the Realm Regulations. The expression, "Persons committed for trial," shall include a person who has entered into recognizance conditions to appear and plead to an indictment or to take his trial upon any criminal charge or who has been committed to prison, there to await his trial for any crime.

California Shipbuilders at Hamburg.

A letter of unusual interest has been received from Dr. Theodore Rethers of this city, who is traveling in Europe. It was written at Hamburg and contains some significant facts about post-war conditions in the great German port.

Dr. Rethers recently left here with Mr. and Mrs. Robert S. Moore and Mr. and Mrs. George A. Armes. The two shipbuilders went abroad primarily to make arrangements with a Norwegian company for the exclusive manufacture of a new type of Diesel engine. The success of this mission should mean a great deal for San Francisco and Oakland. Dr. Rethers is now in either England or Scotland, and intends to visit the principal hospitals on the Continent with the view of investigating the latest methods of surgery as developed by the world war.

Aboard the Manchuria, on which the party left New York, was Dr. W. Kuno, president of the Hamburg-American Steamship Line. Dr. Kuno had been in New York arranging with the Harrimans for the revival of the transatlantic service of his company.

"On our arrival in Cuxhaven," writes Dr. Rethers, "Dr. Kuno invited us to accompany him on a tour of inspection around the harbor Hamburg. Accordingly we embarked on the director's steam yacht and were shown the marvelous docks of the Elbe with their thousands (5000) of hoisting cranes, unloading devices, etc. We inspected the uncompleted but largest steamer in the world, the Bismarck; also the Deutschland, tied to a dock where she had capsized and had been refloated.

"We landed at the new works of the Deutscher Werft Company, which were started a year and a half ago and are still in course of construction. The grounds cover thousands of acres. At present there are in course of constructive forty-five steamers, varying in size from 4000 to 20,000 tons capacity. These works on the Elbe have many immense floating dry-docks.

"The average wage of the mechanic is $1.50 a day, with forty-eight hours' work a week. At present there is a certain degree of unrest among these workmen, as well as in other industries, due to the fact that the government contemplates taxing all wages 10 per cent. at the source of help to pay the cost of war. I might add that there is a surplus of workers, with a great deal of unemployment."

BRITISH LABOR AND RED RUSSIA.

The fate of Warsaw is still in doubt at the moment of writing on Wednesday morning. The Poles have won a modified but a marked success and have repelled the Red attack. None the less the city is likely to fall unless the unforeseen shall happen. The Red armies have invested it in strong force and their military leadership is much superior to that of their enemies. Warsaw will not only be taken, but it will probably be sacked. It will certainly be sovietized. So will the whole of Poland, and an attack by propaganda will then be made upon Germany in the effort to reach France and England, and particularly France. There is no need to dwell upon the chapter of inanities that has produced this result. It became inevitable from the moment when the whole of Europe was allowed to welter in its misery for month after month while three or four men, imagining themselves to be Providence, were chasing the rainbow of the league of nations. It became still more inevitable when the claims of Poland were flouted and the nonsense of self-determination was allowed to stifle the voice of justice. It was certain that Poland would fight for the territory denied to her. It was equally certain that Bolshevik Russia would fight, on one pretext or another, for the subjugation of the Polish barrier. All the world except the peace conferees knew this well. We have now to face a situation that was thus created, and it is a situation that moves steadily toward a debacle.

The most notable feature of the moment is the rift in the Allied lute. The anti-Red forces in Russia are now led by General Baron Wrangel, who is thus the successor of Denikine and Kolchak. France pins her faith to Wrangel and is prepared to support him so far as she dares do so. Great Britain, on the other hand, refuses to lend any aid, moral or material, to Wrangel, and has notified him to that effect. America inclines to the support of France, and has sent warships to the Baltic on the usual diplomatic pretense of saving the lives of Americans, who can of course retreat westward whenever they wish to do so and without let or hindrance. We need not inquire why President Wilson is now so incensed against the Reds, in view of the extraordinary support and encouragement that he gave them during the peace conference, and the incitements to Bolshevism with which his utterances were then so rife. Possibly he feels a moral obligation toward Poland, seeing that the independence of Poland was one of the Fourteen Points. Possibly he feels a resentment against the Bolsheviks for their refusal to be led by his counsels. However that may be, he seems to have ranged himself on the side of France and will doubtless go as far as public opinion will permit, which is probably not very far. We have thus an alignment of America and France in favor of some sort of aggressive movement against the Bolsheviks. Great Britain, on the other hand, refuses to join in the movement. She is intent on the resumption of trade with Russia, while France is equally intent on the collection of her loans. None the less Great Britain would like to help Poland so far as she can do so short of war. France would certainly desire to send an army against the Reds, but the difficulties are almost insuperable. Such an army would have no shadow of an excuse for crossing Germany, and it would probably have to fight Germany in order to do so. There would be a storm of indignation in France and probably a revolution. France may "recognize" Wrangel, although that would do him no good whatever. She can send both military experts and stores to Poland and to Russia, and she is already doing this. But we may doubt if she can give any substantial aid whatever with a bitterly hostile Germany in her path. It is too late. The Reds have the ball at their feet. They can kick it whenever they will.

It may be that Lloyd George is making a virtue of necessity in his present attitude toward Russia. He has that sternly practical view of the possibilities that to some extent has been denied to the French. He does not dare to summon his people to a new war, and a war that might easily surpass all their experiences in that line. For the threat of the labor unions to order a general strike in the event of war with Russia was no idle one. It is true that Lloyd George has taken up the glove thus thrown into the arena and has stated amid the applause of Parliament that the government will be conducted by the regular authorities, and not by the labor unions, and that all the forces of the country will be employed to that end. They were brave words and they were doubtless sincere. We should much like to hear something of the sort over here. None the less Lloyd George was on fairly safe ground, seeing that the labor unions had done no more than voice his own intentions. Lloyd George and the unions were in agreement as to what the country ought to do with regard to Russia, and a conflict between them was therefore improbable. None the less he did well thus sternly rebuke what was no more nor less than a threat to establish a Soviet government in Great Britain.

The British Labor party has just held its conference at Scarborough, and it was from this conference that the threat of a general strike was issued. A year ago the party numbered about half a million. Its present strength is three millions and a half. It is organized in nearly all the English constituencies and it already intends to contest over three hundred of the five hundred and eighty seats. When the general election comes it will probably be ready to conduct a fight in all of them. No less than twelve hundred delegates were present at Scarborough and the proceedings were of the most orderly kind. The debates were by no means confined to labor questions. All phases of politics, national and international, were considered, and it is said that the delegates showed themselves to be much better informed than the average member of Parliament. Resolutions were passed demanding the independence of Egypt and the summoning of a constituent assembly for Ireland. But the threat of a general strike was only in the event of war with Russia. A sympathetic report of the proceedings says that the conference in no way approved of Bolshevism, but it wanted peace, trade, and friendly relations.

The conference "in no way approved of Bolshevism," but then proceeded to act in a typically Bolshevik way. For to override representative government by a threat of force is Bolshevism pure and simple, and, by the same token, it is the negation of democracy. The British House of Commons is elected by nearly universal suffrage. It is much more democratic than the American House of Representatives, seeing that the people can force a general election almost whenever they wish, and that all the members of the government have parliamentary seats and can be called to account and ousted at a few hours' notice. It is hardly possible to imagine a machinery better devised to represent the popular will than the House of Commons, and this is practically admitted by the Labor party when they announce their intention to contest all parliamentary seats and to fill the House of Commons with labor men. But in face of a Parliament which admittedly represents the popular will, and must always be kept abreast of the popular will, the Labor party announce their intention to overawe the House of Commons and the government by a general strike. If this is not undiluted Bolshevism it is hard to say what Bolshevism is.

Let us suppose that the Labor party shall presently succeed in electing a Labor House of Commons, which they are quite likely to do. Let us suppose that the House of Commons then decides upon this, that, or the other line of action. Let us further suppose that the capitalists then devise some means to bring the country to the verge of anarchy and ruin in order to prevent the House from doing what it was created by a popular mandate in order to do. Imagine the outburst of rage at such a defeat of the popular will, the democratic frothings and foamings at the mouth. As a matter of fact we can not imagine any such thing. It has never happened, nor anything like it. The so-called capitalist party has never made any threat of national reprisals in the event of the adoption of a measure or of a policy. There is no single resolution on record anywhere as emanating from capitalists in any way comparable with this threat of the British Labor party to paralyze the whole country if a democratically chosen Parliament and government shall exercise in a particular way the mandate that it received from the people at a general election. It is all very well to disavow Bolshevism, but the disavowal is unfortunately neutralized by action that is definitely Bolshevik in its nature, by action that is an impudent defiance of democracy and the assertion of a right to govern and to control by virtue of force and force alone.

It is significant of the lengths to which we have already gone in the direction of Bolshevism that such a threat as this with its many parallels in this country should be received almost without comment and as belonging to the proper order of things. Indeed it is received with some applause, and even by those who would repudiate any aspersion upon their own democratic loyalties. We take it almost as a matter of course that any organization having the requisite power should use that power to browbeat a democratic government and to force it into compliance with the wishes of an organized minority. Now if the Labor party can ordain that there shall be no war with Russia, even though the vast majority of the people favor war, where shall the exercise of that power stop? Why should not the Labor party similarly control all the other details of government? Why should it not threaten a general strike in case this bill is passed or that other bill rejected, in case the duty on sugar is raised or the duty on tobacco lowered? Why indulge at all in the farce of elections, or congresses, or parliaments? All the necessities of government seem already to be met by the summoning of a labor conference with its power to destroy the nation by means of a general strike. It is true that it is equally within the power of the government to summon soldiers and to make appropriate threats, and the Labor party ought to be the last to complain if their own medicine should thus be administered to them. But then that is civil war. It was what Mr. Lloyd George had in mind when he said: "The Council of Action constitutes in itself one of the most formiable challenges ever given to democracy, and the government must meet the challenge. Such acts as labor contemplates were the genesis of the French revolution." Bolshevism, it is well to remember, does not necessarily show itself, at least in its beginnings, by tortures and massacres, although these things follow in due course. Bolshevism is forcible domination by a minority caste and the overthrow of democratic government by majorities. In Bolshevism the tail wags the dog, not the dog the tail. The threat of the British Labor party is unadulterated Bolshevism, and we need hardly remind ourselves that there have been many examples of the same thing in America. Verbal repudiations of Bolshevism are all very well in their way, but they are somewhat negated by actions that are distinctively Bolshevik, such as have been foreshadowed by Mr. Gompers, who says that he will inflict all sorts of pains and penalties upon us unless we admit that the will of the American Federation of Labor is the supreme law of the land.

The position of England is therefore an uncertain one so far as Bolshevism is concerned, but the position of France is probably far worse. Mr. Robert Dell, whose knowledge of France is unique, shows a tendency in his recent book to take a decidedly gloomy view of the situation. The Frenchman, he tells us, never protests. He suffers in silence so long as he can and then he revolutes. He gives no premonitory warnings. Mr. Dell thinks that Bolshevism is much stronger in France than we suppose and that the gulf between the government and the governed is widening. There have been some ugly fulminations from French Socialists, ugly threats of what will happen in case there is an interference with Russia, and we know that ugly things have happened in France on far less provocation than has now been furnished by the aftermath of war. The difference between the policies of Great Britain and of France may be summarized in a few words. Both yearn ardently for the overthrow of Bolshevism. France believes that this can best be accomplished by force, and England believes that it will more readily follow a pacific policy. And America seems to be nearer to the French position than to the British.

In the meantime Bolshevism is advancing in Asia. Mr. Henry G. Alsberg, writing in the Nation of August 14th from Moscow, and of course from the Bolshevik standpoint, says that Russia will help Kemal Pasha in Turkey and that she is also sending agents to Afghanistan and Beluchistan. She has helped Djemal Pasha to go Indiawards and make trouble. Russia, says Mr. Alsberg, does not need to send huge expeditionary forces to India. "The inhabitants need only be armed and provisioned to come rolling down from the border states to smash the British Raj—with the help of revolting population and troops in India itself. In Mesopotamia there are constant revolts, which, with a little material help, may serve to turn the recent conquerors out. Persia has already commenced to shake off her chains. England may continue to hold isolated Ireland in bondage, but unless she takes a quick decision to make peace with the Soviets, Asia will begin to move." Mr. Alsberg's text is the yearning of the peaceful and happy Bolsheviks to be let alone. England is unwilling to leave them alone, and therefore England must be compelled to do so by the sending of the fiery cross into Asia. Now of course Mr. Alsberg knows better than that. He is merely repeating the little lessons that he has learned at the Bolshevik kindergarten. Heaven forbid that we should insult his intelligence by assuming that he believes any of this nonsense. Asia will indeed "begin to move." She has already begun, but the animosities of Asia are directed against Europe as a whole, and not against only one country. Mr. Alsberg is also aware that England is now the champion, and apparently the only champion, of non-intervention with Russia. Mr. Alsberg also knows that while Soviet Russia may wish to be let alone she has not the slightest intention to return the compliment nor to swerve a hair's breadth from her resolve to destroy the governments of Europe and to use the smouldering discontents of Asia to that end. It may be that the governments of Europe can find a remedy. Evidently they are badly frightened, as well they may be. Whether they can bring themselves to give the means of self-defense to Germany, to take that risk, remains to be seen. The layman can not see very much difference between several million highly-trained soldiers scattered throughout Germany and a portion of those same millions summoned to the defense of their eastern frontier.

SAN FRANCISCO, August 18, 1920.

SIDNEY CORYN.

Lost musical masterpieces composed between the reigns of Henry VII and James I have been discovered in manuscript form in England and will be published. They are said to compare well with works of contemporary productions of Flanders and Italy.

John Wilkes Booth uttered "Sic semper tyrannis" in the box at Ford's Theatre the moment he shot Lincoln, and not on the stage, says William J. Ferguson, an actor who was standing in the wings awaiting his part when the assassination occurred.

INDIVIDUALITIES.

Epstein, the sculptor, whose "Christ" so generally shocked the sensibilities, is a product of New York's East Side. Another controversy over his work has been in progress in England since 1908, the cause being certain figures he made for the British Medical Association's new building.

Little Miss Constance Sunquist, nine years old, Panama Canal Zone girl, is the heroine of the southern waters. She recently swam the canal at Culebra cut with her hands and feet tied. At the age of six she made a thirty-four-foot dive in the Balboa swimming pool every day and swam a mile in 39 minutes and 45 seconds.

Mrs. Medill McCormick, it will be remembered, is the daughter of the late Mark Hanna, the well-known political "boss." Mrs. McCormick, long interested in suffrage, will be an active participant in the affairs this year of her father's party, for, like her senator husband, she is an enthusiastic believer in the principles of democracy as interpreted by the Republican party.

Harry Hogo is eighty-two years of age, has only one leg, and lives the life of a hermit in the Nevada desert. But he operates more than fifty mining claims, with prospecting operations financed by Christine Cornelius, sixty years old, and with the advice of "Rawhide Jack" Davis, famous prospector and mining man. Hogo was the discoverer of the Three Towers mine at Queensland, Australia, when he was twenty-two years of age. Before the civil war he was engaged in running slaves into the Southern States from the Congo, and has enjoyed a life on the edge of things.

Not so many years ago, in Roumania, a little girl dreamed of becoming a great actress. She knew that before her lay almost insurmountable obstacles—poverty, racial prejudice, lack of "influence," and opportunity. But these were overcome, and while still a girl Bertha Kalich was hailed as a star in the capital of her own country. Then she came to America and among the people of her own race she grew in fame as an actress of superb attainments. She was playing in Yiddish then, but studied the language of her new country so assiduously that before long she was a Broadway star.

It pays to be homely, says Mrs. Mary A. Bevan of London. She arrived in port on the steamer Philadelphia to claim the distinction of being the world's homeliest woman and is ready to contest the title with all comers. She is here under contract to appear with the Ringling-Barnum & Bailey circus. Mrs. Bevan's only concern is that she did not discover years ago the value of being homely. She feels she has lost many thousand dollars by her failure to recognize the fact that people are willing to pay to see homely women as well as beautiful ones. Last year she entered a contest at an English seaside resort and won the $5000 first prize, the judges deciding she was the ugliest woman in England. She has two boys and two girls. She said positively that her husband never commented on her looks.

A. L. Westgard, field representative of the American Automobile Association, is known in the automobile and good roads world as the king of pathfinders. Christopher Columbus discovered the outer edge of America, but it remained for this man Westgard to discover and revive the old trails of the inhabitants of past centuries, and to preach facts and spread enthusiasm, until the people living adjacent thereto converted these old trails into modern highways well-nigh as smooth as a ballroom floor. In searching out roads for the laying out of the stupendous system of transcontinental and Canada-to-the-Gulf highways, which now make it possible for the motorists to take jaunts about the continent with ease and speed, Mr. Westgard has found it necessary to make twenty trips from ocean to ocean and thirty trips from the Canadian border to the southern boundary of the United States. On all these trips he was accompanied by his genial wife, who has the distinction of having traveled more miles in an automobile than any woman in the world. The Westgards are as familiar with the country roads of every state in the Union as "Uncle Joe" Cannon and Champ Clark are with the streets of Washington. Much of this pioneer roadway exploring was done over old trails which had never before been penetrated by man other than on horse or mule or on foot. Westgard commenced this useful work back in 1903 and has been unceasingly sticking to the job from that day to this. He has worn out eighteen cars in his travels, and will start out with his nineteenth in a few weeks when he begins locating the national park connecting highways.

Hon. Arthur Meighen, Canada's new premier, was born of Scot-Irish Protestant stock in 1876 at St. Mary's, in the County of Perth in Western Ontario, the son of Joseph and Mary Meighen, and like most eminent men on this continent was raised on a farm. He received his education at the local school, at St. Mary's Collegiate Institute, and Toronto University, where he graduated as B. A. in 1896. For a few years he followed the profession of teaching school, but only as a stepping-stone to the law. Taking Horace Greeley's advice, he went West at the beginning of the century, and after serving his apprenticeship in a Winnipeg law office was admitted to the bar of Manitoba in 1903. He settled down to practice in the little town of Portage La Prairie, the centre of an old established settlement sixty miles west of Winnipeg. He married in 1904 and is now the happy father of two sons and a daughter. Before he had time to build up a large practice politics claimed him and has held him ever since. In 1908 he was nominated as Conservative candidate for the riding of Portage La Prairie and was elected after a bitter fight. His party was then fighting a hard battle in opposition and was in serious need of able recruits, so that a man of his ability was gladly welcomed. He soon made his mark as a speaker and showed frequent signs of independence in advocating causes which his party chieftains frowned upon. He was reelected in 1911, when his party came into office, and continued to gain in parliamentary stature. In 1913 he was appointed solicitor-general without a seat in the cabinet, but this promotion came to him two years later, when he was also made a privy councillor.

Auld Lang Syne.

Should auld acquaintance be forgot,
And never brought to min'?
Should auld acquaintance be forgot,
And days o' lang syne?

CHORUS.

For auld lang syne, my dear,
For auld lang syne,
We'll take a cup o' kindness yet
For auld lang syne.

We twa hae run about the braes,
And pu'd the gowans fine;
But we've wandered mony a weary foot
Sin' auld lang syne.

We twa hae paidl't i' the hurn,
Frae mornin' sun till dine;
But seas between us braid hae roared
Sin' auld lang syne.

And here's a hand, my trusty frere,
And gie's a hand o' thine;
And we'll tak a right guid wallie-waught
For auld lang syne.

And surely ye'll be your pint-stoup,
And surely I'll be mine;
And we'll tak a cup o' kindness yet
For auld lang syne. —Robert Burns.

Hamlet's Soliloquy on Death.

To be, or not to be, that is the question:
Whether 'tis nobler in the mind to suffer
The slings and arrows of outrageous fortune,
Or to take arms against a sea of troubles,
And by opposing end them! To die,—to sleep,—
No more; and, by a sleep, to say we end
The heartache, and the thousand natural shocks
That flesh is heir to,—'tis a consummation
Devoutly to be wished. To die,—to sleep;—
To sleep; perchance to dream;—ay, there's the rub;
For in that sleep of death what dreams may come,
When we have shuffled off this mortal coil,
Must give us pause: there's the respect,
That makes calamity of so long life:
For who would bear the whips and scorns of time,
The oppressor's wrong, the proud man's contumely,
The pangs of despised love, the law's delay,
The insolence of office, and the spurns
That patient merit of the unworthy takes,
When he himself might his quietus make
With a bare bodkin? Who would fardels bear,
To grunt and sweat under a weary life,
But that the dread of something after death,
The undiscovered country, from whose bourne
No traveler returns, puzzles the will,
And makes us rather bear those ills we have,
Than fly to others that we know not of?
Thus conscience does make cowards of us all;
And thus the native hue of resolution
Is sicklied o'er with the pale cast of thought
And enterprises of great pith and moment,
With this regard, their currents turn awry,
And lose the name of action. —Shakespeare.

The Stormy Petrel.

A thousand miles from land are we,
Tossing about on the stormy sea,—
From billow to bounding billow cast,
Like fleecy snow on the stormy blast.
The sails are scattered abroad like weeds;
The strong masts shake like quivering reeds;
The mighty cables and iron chains,
The hull, which all earthly strength disdains,—
They strain and they crack; and hearts like stone
Their natural, hard, proud strength disown.

Up and down!—up and down!
From the base of the wave to the hallow's crown,
And amidst the flashing and feathery foam
The stormy petrel finds a home,—
A home, if such a place may be—
For her who lives on the wide, wide sea,
On the craggy ice, in the frozen air,
And only seeketh her rocky lair
To warm her young, and to teach them to spring
At once o'er the waves on their stormy wing!

O'er the deep!—o'er the deep!
Where the whale and the shark and the swordfish sleep,—
Outflying the blast and the driving rain,
The petrel telleth her tale—in vain;
For the mariner curseth the warning bird
Which bringeth him news of the storm unheard!
Ah! thus does the prophet of good or ill
Meet hate from the creatures he serveth still;
Yet he never falters,—so, petrel, spring
Once more o'er the waves on thy stormy wing!
—Bryan W. Procter (Barry Cornwall).

WHAT ABOUT OUR EDUCATION?

Mr. Henry Arthur Jones Attributes Most of Our Evils to the Errors of the Public School.

Mr. Henry Arthur Jones is not the only nor the first author who has started out to write upon one topic and has subsequently found himself writing upon something quite different. He tells us that he was moved to send a letter to the English newspapers on the edict that prevents children from appearing on the stage, but he found that such a letter would be too long. Moreover, it seemed to involve the whole system of popular education which, in its turn, lay coiled around the roots of the national character. Under these circumstances it seemed best to address an open letter to the British minister of education, and then the vast panorama "caught me in its whirl." What hope could there be for a people fed on unrealities and trivialities, evading every great and real problem, but always to be snared by such catchwords as "making the world safe for democracy," "self-determination" and a "brotherhood of nations"? And so the present substantial volume came into being, a general arraignment of secular and religious education, of the theatre, and of all the great forces that mold the public mind, or what it pleases us to call the public mind, very much as a potter models the clay. Mr. Jones addresses himself to a British audience, but the limitation is hardly discernible. The evils of which he complains are to be found to an almost equal extent in America. Here, too, we find the same popular diet of puerilities, the same evasions and falsifications of facts, the same steady appeal to the basenesses rather than to the nobilities of human nature.

Why is it that Shakespeare has lost in popularity pari passu with the spread of education? Have we here a case of cause and effect or only of coincidence? What is wrong with education and what is wrong with the drama? Why is Shakespeare neglected in England and fostered in Germany?

He has been absent from the English stage. But he has not been absent from the German stage. In the year before the war there were sixty-six companies playing Shakespeare in Germany, and in Berlin eight theatres put up twenty-five different Shakespearean productions; while 1104 representations were given of "The Merchant of Venice" alone. Our English record for that year is too contemptible to set down. Our record since the war, compared with Germany's, would probably prove to be equally contemptible, equally shameful to us, and equally dishonoring to Shakespeare. May not Germany well fling at us the taunt that "if music-hall and cinematograph England" had been possessed with the spirit of Shakespeare, we should long ago have won the war?

Mr. Jones invites the minister of education to consider the influence of the music-hall. There one may find a "blazing popular comedian" deliver lines of ill-concealed filthiness "for which his hourly rate of pay was probably ten times as much as you receive for superintending the education of the kingdom." But as a rule the music-hall is not indecent. It is only idiotic, which is worse. Its entertainments are largely composed of dull mediocrity, banality, tawdry sentiment, rank sensation, horribly vulgar sensual suggestion, and sheer imbecility.

When the war had been in progress for long over two years, and we were in deadly grapple for our lives, I saw at a West End theatre a large troupe of chorus girls, all uniformed as men, in tightly-fitting coats, cut short with little flaps, so as to display the least attractive part of their bodies, and set off with other items of man's attire in garish colors; the whole costume being a pattern and model of vile, ugly, senseless, bad taste. The girls had been drilled to perform in unison a series of quite meaningless operations and evolutions, waving their arms, lifting their legs, placing their bodies in ridiculous ungraceful attitudes, and sometimes flaunting unconsciously that terribly conspicuous and least attractive part of their bodies which the costume seemed chiefly designed to "exploit." The hideous exhibition was accompanied by music that could only be described as appropriate to it. I had come into the theatre reading of horrible battle carnage in Flanders. My heart sank within me, and I hurried away from this more dreadful scene.

The drama has gone steadily downhill. Shakespeare is no longer endured, but his place was taken some fifty years ago by the burlesques of Byron and Burnand, and they were often amusing and witty and the dialogue was in good English. But their day has passed, except to a certain extent in the metropolis. The dialogue is now slovenly, uncolloquial, and insincere. It is usually in very bad English:

I will give a sample. The following sentence was spoken in a fashionable West End theatre, in a piece that had no connected story or discoverable plot; where none of the personages, so far as I could discern, acted from any intelligible motive, or had any reason for being in the places where they found themselves. There was a succession of bright tawdry scenes, a display of gorgeous dresses, a crowd of chorus girls, and several star performers of both sexes, who appeared in different disguises throughout this disordered maze and revel of insanity. The leading comedian was making advances to the leading lady.

"I suppose you mean to infer that I'm hot stuff," she replied.

I am fastidious in the matter of dialogue, and I claim that this line should have read, "Then you think I'm a whore."

That is good Shakespearean English, and it says what she meant in exactly half the number of syllables. It has also the merit of implying a reproof instead of a sanction for further impropriety.

Mr. Jones asks to what extent we must blame popular education for this descent into blatant vulgarity and flagrant silliness, and at a time when governing power is falling steadily into the hands of those who seem to have been robbed of all power to think or to reflect. It is in the popular theatre that we see people as they actually are, and now the stage makes hideous exposure of our unsightly mental and spiritual nakedness:

I ask you, sir, to dwell for a moment on the comparative levels of popular education in the time of Elizabeth and in our present time, as measured by the popular entertainments in their respective theatres. There was plenty of brutal, obscene amusement in the days of Elizabeth. Doubtless there were displays which would have shocked the ears and eyes of many of the frequenters of our present popular theatres, though I question if those coarser entertainments of a coarser and more robust age were so charged with insidious corruption and mental depravity as some of our present-day entertainments. But alongside those brutal exhibitions, there flourished the greatest drama of all times.

One might put up with a large amount of tawdry, extravagant display and witless vulgarity—treating it as mere holiday exuberance—if alongside we had a vigorous, sane, modern drama that addressed itself to intelligent audiences. But the music-hall has usurped and devastated nearly all the evening leisure of our masses. It is our national school of taste and manners, and it clearly indicates the level and the drift of our popular education.

The author reverts to the danger that must come to a state from the mental corrosion of its people. There was a time when we hailed popular education as the solution of all social problems, the augury of a social millennium. What are we to think now of popular education as we witness its fruits in the theatre and the music-hall and the movie? Is this all that education can do for us?

If a man drugs me with ether, and takes from me my watch, he knows he has robbed me, and, in his heart, he probably calls himself a thief. But if, in some greatly involved matter of politics, a man drugs me with the fumes of his words and his whimsies, and takes from me my power of right judgment, he doesn't know that he has robbed me, and he probably calls himself a Social Reformer. Very likely, before drugging me, he has carefully and systematically drugged himself, and then, if it is to our personal or class interest to be deceived, we go on drugging each other, and we form a caucus to drug all our neighbors.

And by and by a monstrous hill comes in for the state to pay.

What shall it profit us, we are asked, if we exchange the war of the battlefield for the war of commercial and economic life? The battlefield does at least produce heroisms and shining sacrifices, but what does this other produce? What is this peace that we acclaim, and how rich is it in "the valors and sanctities of the soul, the ornaments and elegancies of the mind"?

I have known much of English commercial life. I have some knowledge and experience of American commercial methods and practices. These nations may justly claim that, as human nature is constituted, they compare very favorably with most other nations. There is certainly a greater proportion of righteous men in London and in New York than would have saved Sodom from destruction. But commercial life everywhere seems to be necessarily leavened with baseness, dishonesty, greed, and cunning selfishness. Can we contemplate, with any satisfaction, the perpetual dedication of the greater part of mankind to industrialism and commercialism, human life everywhere becoming more mechanical, more uniformly prosperous and banal and smug, dwarfed down to standards of material comfort and competence? The spirit of man loses its finest impulses, loses its wings if it stays too long in the warm nest of material prosperity. On both sides of the Atlantic, amongst men of high repute and great commercial standing, I have known trade dealings and daily practices so abhorrently mean and dishonest that rather than put my son to fight for his livelihood with such weapons I would thrust him into the deadliest forefront of our battle line, and think I had acted well by him.

Education has given us a wrong standard of values. We have become materialists and utilitarians, sanctifying ourselves with silly sentiment, as in that detestable song which declared "I did not raise by darling boy to be a soldier":

So sang the American mothers two years ago, hugging their darling boys to their bosoms. But He that had the steerage of their course caught them in His fist, blew His strong breath, and filled their sails, and wafted them to France, there to fulfill the destiny that He, and not their mothers, had chosen for them. Nor will any American mother whose son is gathered amongst the first fruits of her country's valor, in that richest vintage those vineyards have ever known, esteem him any the less her pride and joy, because he found in the valley of the Marne a safer and more sacred resting-place than in her arms.

One of the results of education has been internationalism, with Mr. H. G. Wells for its prophet. Internationalism seems to consist largely of a defense of iniquities. Mr. Wells says that the Bolsheviks are "straight," that they are "probably honest," and "profoundly wise," and "shining clear," and thus far superior to Western statesmen "crudely ignorant of the world of modern ideas," that is to say Mr. Wells' ideas:

Can human imagination conceive our plight today, if our rulers had followed Mr. Wells' advice, and had incorporated the cause of the Allies with that filthy mass of corruption, fraud, massacre, disease, and anarchy which now festers in the vitals of the Russian people? How thankful we may be that our foreign office is filled with limited, ignorant, uneducated men, who, not possessing Mr. Wells' "clarity," and being "crudely ignorant" in Mr. Wells' "world of modern ideas," could not get a grip upon the situation.

Mr. Wells is prepared at a moment's notice to reconstruct the human race. He is perfectly informed as to the behavior of men under all conceivable circumstances, and with the eagle eye of prevision he foresees the future of the human race:

I can not, however, agree with Mr. Archibald Spofforth, who, in his recently published "Noted English Seers," places Mr. Wells rather below Old Moore in the rank of prophets. It may be true, as Mr. Spofforth argues, that Old Moore has lately been more successful in making lucky shots at futurity. But this is due, not so much to his professional skill in prophecy, as to mere chance; and Mr. Wells, who, it must be owned, has been a little unfortunate in his recent premonitions, may confidently look to the law of average to put him on a level with Old Moore in this respect. We must also remember that Old Moore has been longer in the business than Mr. Wells, and may well have profited from his many past failures to make events tally with his predictions. Under one of his hieroglyphics for 1919, the elder prophet cautiously remarks, "Old Moore does not say that what we see in the picture will be brought about." This modest and judicious attitude towards his own prognostications is one that might be imitated by most prophets with great advantage to their reputations. Would that all our social prophets had the wisdom and candor of Old Moore, and an equal courage to avow that what they fondly dream may not be realized!

The value that we place upon a thing may usually be measured by the price that we are willing to pay for it. What are we willing to pay for erudition in comparison with other things? The Arbroath school board, for example, offers £80 a year as salary for a schoolteacher who must have high intellectual and moral qualifications, but the same town pays its scavengers nearly £102 a year, that is to say over 25 per cent. more:

Again, what manual work calls for less skill, or thought, or knowledge of any kind, calls for less care in habits, conduct, manners, dress, or character, than that of a scavenger—its one desirable, but not necessary qualification, being a diminished sensibility of the olfactory nerves. What would you consider, sir, to be a suitable salary for an Arbroath scavenger, comparing his work and responsibilities with the work and responsibilities of an Arbroath schoolteacher? The town pays its scavengers £101 18s. per annum, that is, over 25 per cent. more wages than it pays its schoolteachers.

What treasure houses of social and economic information are these advertisement columns of newspapers! Let us take another sample.

The Bath City Council and Education Committee require an assistant to the School of Commerce and Languages. This, again, is a post which seems to demand that its occupant shall possess rather high and varied qualifications and accomplishments. He is offered £90 a year. Meantime the Daily Chronicle offers £208 a year (£4 a week), with permanent employment and easy hours, to a ragpicker—a calling which, like scavenging, demands neither skill of hand or brain, nor any qualification of character or conduct.

How excellent a thing is Education! How far more excellent is plenty of good bread and cheese and beer!

Is it not, sir, a grave reproach to your department that a dejected and servile employment like ragpicking should be paid more than two and a half times as highly as school teaching? Doubtless, sir, you will consider it advisable to redress this grievance of your teachers, and to see they have no cause to envy the affluence of the happy ragpickers.

The inception of the league of nations is cited by the author as an illustration of the fatuities saddled upon immature minds by the educational falsities of the day. The peace conference decided that the ending of the war was a quite secondary and negligible matter in comparison with an ideal that was so much easier to think about and to enthuse about than the realities of facts:

It is distressing to find that there have been some quibbling and friction about the constitution and scope of the league of nations. But the scheme has the warm support of my Aunt Julia, whose husband was eaten by cannibals, and who therefore speaks with inside knowledge of the subject. Those objectors who have remained deaf to President Wilson's powerful arguments would, I feel sure, be convinced by my Aunt Julia. She very pertinently asks why a league of nations was not established in the very dawn of history, and then there would have been no wars at all. She is lending the movement all the weight of her moral influence, and all the vigor of her tongue. If any further doubts or discussions should arise, I hope the assembled statesmen may be persuaded to call my Aunt Julia to their councils. Her voluble optimism admirably qualifies her to deal with the question.

It will gratify President Wilson to know that whatever difficulties or disasters the league of nations may have to encounter, he can always be assured of the active sympathy and cooperation of my Aunt Julia. From the time when the question was first hushed she has been enthusiastically in its favor. So much so that she has declared throughout if we could only get a league of nations she did not care what its conditions might be, or what nations came into it, or whether it would work or not. The main thing was to draw up some document, call it a league of nations, and then defy any nation to go to war. I mention this to show how wholeheartedly she has supported President Wilson.

What shall the future be? The alternatives, says the author, are patriotism and internationalism, substance and dream. It is not patriotism that severs nations. It unites them. It is not internationalism that will bring the kingdom of heaven upon earth, but rather the kingdom of hell. Mr. Jones addresses his appeal to his own countrymen, but it is equally valid upon this side of the Atlantic. And the choice, the definite choice, must be made.

PATRIOTISM AND POPULAR EDUCATION. By Henry Arthur Jones. New York: E. P. Dutton & Co.; $4.

A beaver in a park was experimentally placed at work on a tree twelve feet long and two feet six inches thick, just as the town clock sounded the hour of noon. The beaver began by barking the tree a foot above the ground. That done, he attacked the wood. He worked hard, alternating his labor with dips in his bathing pond. He bathed and labored alternately; then he ate his supper of bread and carrots, which the keeper brought him, and paddled about in his pond until half-past 5 o'clock. Ten minutes later, when only one inch of the tree's diameter remained intact, he bore upon his work and the tree fell. Before it fell the beaver ran as men run when they have fired a blast. Then as the tree lay on the ground he portioned it out mentally and began to gnaw. He worked at intervals all night; cut the log into three parts, rolled two of the portions into the water, and reserved the other third for his permanent shelter. The work done, he took a bath.

BANKING AND INVESTMENT NEWS.

San Francisco's bank clearings for the week ending August 14, 1920, were $153,000,000; for the corresponding week of last year, $161,500,000; a decrease of $10,500,000.

Considerable gains in gold held by the bank, in total gold reserves, in total reserves, and in total resources, but losses over half a million dollars each in total bills on hand and total earning assets of the Federal Reserve Bank of San Francisco took place during the week ending August 13th. The gains amounted respectively to $6,689,000, $3,575,000, $3,637,000, and $5,805,000.

Discounted bills secured by government war obligations rose nearly a million dollars and bills bought in the open market fell off over $1,100,000.

There has been so much talk about small investors cashing in their Liberty bonds and gate value of Liberty bonds held for their depositors was found to be approximately $17,000,000, or an average of about $2,500,000 for each bank. For the convenience of its depositors the Williamsburg Savings Bank is holding in round numbers $1,500,000 in Liberty bonds, and the controller of this institution says the amount is steadily increasing.

"At the Bowers Savings Bank the amount of Liberty bonds entrusted to the institution by its depositors is estimated at $2,000,000. Here also it is reported that the total amount held for customers is showing a gradual increase.

"The Dime Savings Bank in Brooklyn is holding for its depositors approximately $2,500,000 in Liberty bonds, and from the time that the bank made known its willingness to care for the securities of the depositors the holdings have shown a steady increase.

"What is described as a high-water mark has been reached by the Franklin Savings Bank in the amount of Liberty bonds safeguarded for its depositors. At present $2,735,000 in these securities is held for safe-keeping, and there has not been a single week in which the total holdings were not increased.

"The largest amount reported by a single bank was that of the Bank of Savings, which is holding $3,500,000 of its depositors' Liberty bonds. These holdings are steadily being increased.

"Depositors of the Brooklyn Savings Bank have accumulated $2,500,000 in Liberty bonds, which they have placed in the care of that institution, and the holdings are increasing rapidly.

"Not only do the savings banks generally agree to take care of Liberty bonds for depositors who have no safety vaults, but the banks undertake to clip the coupons and deposit the amount to the credit of the customer. In the first place, when a bond is placed in the care of the bank it is deposited to the credit of the customer, and unless he requests that a particular bond be returned to him on demand, a bond of the same denomination and issue as deposited is given back to him when he makes the request for its return."

John Marshall, Jr., vice-president of the Fireman's Fund, left August 7th for New York to attend the first meeting of the governing committee of the new National Underwriters Conference. This committee is composed of twenty members, fifteen of whom must be company presidents or vice-presidents. The other five members are the elected representatives of the local conferences in the different sections of the country.

The Federal Reserve Bank of San Francisco has announced the treasury's issuance of government bonds Series C-1921, bearing 6 per cent. interest. The bonds are dated August 16, 1920, mature August 16, 1921, and are in denominations of $500 to $100,000. The bonds are exempt from all taxation with the exception of the estate and inheritance tax, surtaxes, excess and war profits taxes.

Local shippers have been advised of a penalty charge of $10 a day which has been authorized by the Interstate Commerce Commission for the detention more than forty-eight hours of all open-top cars and cars loaded with lumber, coal, or coke. This new charge is in addition to the regular demurrage rate, and is designed to prevent undue detention of equipments in the present emergency.

The penalty charge will apply on forest materials to which the lumber rates themselves apply, but excepts cars held at ports for transshipment by vessel.

Reconsignment rules on all freight in open-top cars and coal and coke in all cars are amended to permit of but one reconsignment under certain conditions and exceptions, outside of which any reconsignment, diversion, or reshipment will subject the freight to the local rates plus five dollars per car.

The stock market has been under pressure of the severest liquidation for the past two weeks it has seen for a long time. When fairly strong pools are unable to support their securities and are even compelled to sell at whatever prices they can secure it makes for a condition that is delightful to the professional bear operator. It also makes for a situation that should be quite satisfactory to that considerable element in Wall Street that before buying has the patience to await just some such disastrous break in the market as accompanies semi-panic conditions. Once or twice a year these conditions recur.

The cause for the selling has been primarily due to the policy of the banks in curtailing their loans and to an extent it has been considerably increased by the fact that the Polish situation discouraged a good deal of buying that otherwise would have softened the fall in security prices.

It looks as if the turn in the situation were rather close at hand and that the lowest average prices for a long time are likely to be reached within the next week.

There are so many splendid bargain opportunities in the list these days that it is hardly worth while to enumerate them. The railroad stocks will offer a splendid field for bullish operations when the market turns. There are a good many low-priced rails that can be favorably exploited by pools and the banking interest will be found encouraging anything that will develop a stronger market for railroad securities, as practically every financial institution of consequence in the country is more or less loaded up with railroad stocks and bonds. In the past few months we have seen successful pool operations in stocks like Rock Island, Pere Marquette, and Southern Railway, and it is probable that such operations for a long time to come will be quite as conspicuous in the railway share list as among the industrials. It will require, however, consistent good management on the part of the railroads to make the best of the readjustment brought about by the rate and wage development.

Public utility issues will be restored to public favor in due course. Better rates must be afforded them in order to permit more efficient service. Court developments have favored Consolidated Gas and it is unlikely that the company will lose out in the appeal from the $1.20 decision. This stock from its asset value viewpoint is a distinct bargain. Philadelphia Company is another. It is selling close to $30 a share, has a long and enviable dividend record and is now paying $3 a share a year, with large surplus and immensely valuable concealed equities. Its earnings are gaining ground at the rate of about $3 a share per year, so that favorable dividend developments should not be long postponed. This company is controlled by the United Railways Investment Company, which is meeting success in its reorganization of its other most important subsidiary, United Railroads of San Francisco.

E. H. Rollins & Sons are participating in the offering of an issue of $500,000 City of Pasadena 4 1/2 per cent. bonds for the purpose of obtaining funds to enable the city to take over the electric lighting distribution system of the Southern California Edison Company. The bonds are dated August 1st, are a legal investment for savings banks and trust funds in the state, are eligible as security for postal savings deposits, and are tax-exempt in the state.

The bonds have back of them an assessed valuation of $73,363,977, and the total debt of the city, including the present loan, will be only $2,157,250, from which a water debt of $1,100,000, when deducted, leaves a net debt of only $1,057,250. Pasadena's nine banks have aggregate deposits of about $22,000,000. The bonds are a direct obligation of the whole city and payable from taxes on all taxable property in it.

Maturities are $23,000 or $22,000 annually on August 1st and prices allow yields from 5.81 per cent. in 1921 to 5.60 in 1926-30.

The automobile manufacturers of the United States made in the fiscal year just ended their highest record in supplying foreign markets. The total value of automobiles and accessories, such as tires, engines, and other separate parts, exported in the fiscal year 1920, says a statement by the National City Bank of New York, aggregates $275,000,000 against $138,000,000 two years ago and $30,000,000 in the year preceding the war. Thus the value of automobiles and accessories exported in the fiscal year 1920 are nine times as much as in the year before the war and more than double that of the closing year of the war.

The whole world, adds the bank's statement, seems to be demanding motor vehicles for passenger and freight purposes and looking to the United States for its supply. The number of commercial cars exported in the first eleven months of the fiscal year 1920 was, according to the official reports of the government, 21,656 against 11,134 in the same months of 1919, and the number of passenger cars 103,146 against 32,412 in the corresponding months of 1919. Great Britain, which saw the practical qualities of the American commercial automobile during the war, took in the first eleven months of the fiscal year 1920, according to the above authority, over $5,500,000 worth of our commercial automobiles against $2,500,000 worth in the same months of the preceding year. Cuba, which recognized the convenience and practicability in a tropical climate of the power-driven vehicle as against that driven by animals, took of our commercial automobiles in the eleven months of the fiscal year 1920 1419 machines, valued at over $3,000,000, against 610 machines, valued at a little over $1,000,000, in the same months of the preceding year. To the distant Dutch East Indies the number of commercial machines sent was 440 against 309 in the same months of 1919, and only 68 in the corresponding months of 1918, and to our own Philippine Islands 698 commercial machines in the 1920 period against 159 in the same period of 1919, while British Oceania, which consists chiefly of Aus-

A brief memorandum showing at a glance the causes of the existing money stringency and a possible programme for relieving it has been prepared by the brokerage firm of A. B. Leach & Co. It is presented as follows in the news columns of the Boston News Bureau:

"The cause of the money stringency:

"1. Transfer of large sums to Europe, in particular: (a) For the purchase of foreign internal and foreign-owned American securities, for real estate, control of foreign enterprises, luxuries (such as precious stones and high-priced semiluxuries, as silks, etc.). (b) To support dependents and by emigrants in person. (c) For relief work abroad. (d) Enormous speculation in foreign exchange.

"2. Hoarding (outright by the foreign element), and for the purpose of future purchases of 'bargains' in material and securities.

"3. Reduction of producing power of labor in general by 20 per cent. to 50 per cent., making necessary the investment of tremendously increased amounts in the labor cost of all raw materials and finished goods, including foodstuffs.

"4. Lack of thrift (the craving for luxuries and non-essentials is still general).

"5. Transportation difficulties causing the storing-up of essential goods and thereby restricting additions of new wealth.

"6. The preparation for the financing of the crops, which requires the contraction of loans and the curtailment of new issues of securities. Nos. 4, 5, and 6 are the principal causes working against the accumulation of surplus capital, which is the essential need for industrial expansion.

"7. Instalment payments on Federal taxes restricting, temporarily, the use of large amounts of money for productive purposes—this on account of the slowness of getting this money back into the banks, available for commercial needs.

"8. The uncertainty of the political outlook.

"The possibilities for relief:

"1. Improvement in the labor situation: (a) By a return to pre-war efficiency. (b) By the functioning of courts of mediation in disputes. (c) By education (mutually of capital and labor and the liberalizing of the leadership of labor). (d) By a broad-minded immigration policy (possibly by unemployment in certain overexpanded industries, as automobiles, silks, shoes, clothing, shipyards).

"2. The addition of new wealth from agricultural crops, the principal ones of which are estimated to yield the following quantities: Wheat, 809,000,000 bushels; corn, 2,779,000,000 bushels; oats, 1,322,000,000 bushels; cot-where the aggregate thus accumulated had decreased." He continues:

"Of eight savings banks where inquiries were made all reported that there had been a steady increase in the amount of Liberty bonds held for depositors, while two of this number said the demands of depositors had reached such proportions that the privilege had to be discontinued. These banks had declined to accept any more Liberty bonds for safe-keeping, not because they wished to discourage depositors from making investments in these issues, but because they found it was physically impossible to take care of the accounts with their organizations as at present constituted.

"In seven of the largest savings banks of Manhattan, Brooklyn, and Queens the aggregate ton, 11,450,000 bales of 500 pounds each; hay, 110,000,000 tons. It is difficult to state the amount of the wealth which the above quantities will represent, but a conservative estimate would be in excess of two billion dollars.

"3. Interest payments on foreign debts to the United States and payments to reduce these debts, which debts, with the improvement of the productive power of Europe, will gradually be substituted by the largely increased importation of goods.

"4. The improvement in the transportation situation.

"5. The improvement of the financial and economic conditions of the principal European countries.

"6. A 'business' government.

"7. Improvement of the Federal Reserve machinery."

The improvement in the cotton crop prospect as reported by the government recently was not quite as great as had been looked for, and the short interest, which had been rather extended in anticipation of this report, was inclined to cover, with a resulting sharp advance. The extent of the crop seems any one's guess at this time, but around 12,000,000 bales would seem to be a fair average estimate with a leeway on one side or the other of 1,000,000 bales, due either to very favorable crop conditions during the remainder of the season or serious damage by holl weevil or early frosts.

The price of the staple at present is very high relatively, and the credit and monetary conditions throughout the world are such as to suggest that there will be increasing economy in spending. Banking restrictions are beginning to have a sort of progressive effect on industry generally.

It begins to look as if we would have a wonderful corn crop this year, which is particularly important, in view of the relatively light wheat crop, though, of course, the wheat output will be very much greater than had been looked for a few months ago. The bears have had the best of it in the grain markets ever since the resumption in wheat trading. Prices are still extravagantly high as compared with normal years and, as we have definitely changed from a period of inflation to one of deflation, the undercurrent of prices in grains and agricultural products generally is to levels a good deal lower than we have seen. The situation might change in the event of any further great successes on the part of the Russian army.

Now that the freight rate decision has been rendered, it is up to the banking interests of the country in cooperation with the various governmental departments that could lend a hand to finance the great requirements of the railroads in the matter of rails and equipments. The underlying foreign demand is still extraordinary, though the financial problems concerned are difficult. If this situation works out the way every one hopes it will mean a long period of decided activity on the part of various rail mills and equipment corporations and, of course, would utilize an immense amount of steel.

There has been in recent years a radical increase in our steel-making capacity, and it will require this large demand from our railroads in order to keep up prices in the trade, as banking restrictions otherwise will have a tendency to diminish the demand for steel products in other lines.

Steel prices, however, must be deflated just as much as everything else before we can get back to anything like an approach to normal business conditions, and in consequence consumers in this trade will place orders with particular regard to their early requirements. There has been seemingly a definite conclusion of the speculative buying in the trade which has had in the past few years at times a tendency to lift prices sensationally.

The world demands more efficient transportation facilities, and in this country it has been found that many railroads when electrically equipped are in position to offer much more efficient service. There are in this situation vast possibilities for an enormously increased demand for copper metal. Copper, when production costs are considered, is selling much lower than the average of commodities generally, and it would not require any great buying demand to bring about a favorable price readjustment.

Net earnings of $404,399.56 have been reported for the first six months of the present year by the C. L. Best Tractor Company. The statement comes through Cyrus Peirce & Co.

In addition to showing the strong position of this California organization, the statement of earnings is significant of the company's management when it is compared with the estimate of earnings for the year made more than three months ago by the company.

In April it was estimated net earnings for the year 1920 would be $750,000, and at the rate of earnings during the first six months this amount will be exceeded by more than $58,000. After provision for Federal taxes net earnings have been more than nine times the interest on outstanding preferred stock.

The Good Railway Service Association of California is calling the attention of all its members to the June report of the Pacific Car Demurrage Bureau, showing that 10,000 more cars were held beyond free time in that month over June of 1919, the demurrage charges increasing from $34,011 to $63,797.

Commenting further upon a statement issued by K. M. Nicoles, chairman of the San Francisco Committee on Car Service, officials of the Good Railway Service Association point out that while it is possible that shippers can afford to lose $63,797 in demurrage, they can scarcely afford the loss of approximately 30,000 car-days. According to Mr. Nicoles, the Commission on Car Service in its monthly statement on the car situation in the United States, on July 28th, shows that the heavy demand for box-cars continues, especially in the grain-growing section to which empty cars are being moved from the Eastern and Southeastern districts as an emergency measure to save the crops. This movement will compel California and the Pacific Coast shippers to make still more intensive use of their cars. Car shortage reports for the country, as of July 15th, show deferred requisitions for over 100,000 cars.

The Good Railway Service Association of California urges all its members and shippers generally to load heavy, load and unload quickly, as an assistance to the carriers in the effort to increase the average miles per car per day.

The Blankenhorn-Hunter-Dulin Company announce that of an issue of $600,000 first mortgage 6 per cent. sinking fund gold bonds of San Diego Lands, Inc., underwritten and offered by them in March of this year, there remain outstanding only $274,500. The bonds have been retired through the sales of real estate, which sales to date exceed $800,000.

A report of the president of San Diego Lands, Inc., to the stockholders, issued as of July 1, 1920, sets forth the information that the company was incorporated January 12, 1920, and acquired from J. P. Morgan & Co. of New York approximately 28,000 acres of land, diversified as to character, in San Diego County, California, and that approximately 6000 acres have been sold.

The Freeman, Smith & Camp Company is participating in an offer of $1,000,000 Pacific Power and Light Company first lien and general mortgage 8 per cent. gold bonds at a price of 98 1/4, yielding 8 1/4 per cent. These bonds are in denominations of $1000 and $500, due August 1, 1920, and redeemable at any time upon four weeks' notice up to and including August 1, 1925, at 105 and accrued interest and 1 per cent. per annum less thereafter until maturity.

The Pacific Power and Light Company was incorporated in 1910 by the consolidation of several established properties, owned in fee, some of which have now been in successful operation for twenty-five years. The company's business is conducted without competition and under satisfactory franchises in the states of Washington, Oregon, and Idaho, in an agricultural industrial territory, which in the past ten years has shown a growth of approximately 61 per cent. in population. Among the communities served are Walla Walla, Yakima, and Vancouver, Washington; Astoria, The Dalles, Pendleton, and Hood River, Oregon, and Lewiston, Idaho.

The company operates in the states of Wash-

Von Falkenhayn's Story.

Lieut-General von Falkenhayn, then German minister of war, became chief of the general staff of the army in the field on September 14, 1914, taking the place of the invalided General von Moltke. Just two years later, on August 28th, he was informed that the Kaiser had summoned Field Marshal von Hindenburg to consultation. This was naturally regarded by Von Falkenhayn as a dismissal and he laid down his duties at once. It is the story of these two years that he gives us in his present volume.

It is difficult, and indeed unnecessary, to epitomize a narrative of military movements. The author disclaims any intention to write a history of the war. He is concerned only with the events for which the general staff was responsible. He tells us that he found affairs in a serious, but not in a desperate position. Indeed he seems never to have been very optimistic. He deprecates the necessity of waging a trench war. His apology for the Verdun adventure is half-hearted. He admits that the Somme battle was a British success, although only a partial one, and he thinks that if the Austrian army had done what was expected of it Italy would have been forced out of the war. Indeed he does not seem to have believed at any time in the possibility of unqualified victory for Germany. His best hope was that Germany might so hammer her enemies that they themselves could not pay the price of victory.

THE GERMAN GENERAL STAFF AND ITS DECISIONS. By General von Falkenhayn. New York: Dodd, Mead & Co.

With the Chinks.

Among side lights on the war is this pleasant book by Lieutenant Daryl Klein. The author was in China at the time of the war and he volunteered for the training of Chinese coolies who were to be sent to France to work behind the line. In this book he tells us all about it, and it makes good reading. He says: "The coolie whom we trained and brought to France is a simple, jolly fellow. He is content with the very simplicities of life; he steals, but not overmuch; he is to be trusted. He is extraordinarily happy; he grins and grins; he is good to his fellow-creatures." What more could one want?

WITH THE CHINKS. By Daryl Klein. New York: John Lane Company; $1.50.

Ordnance and War.

Public interest in American ordnance and munitions of war in general was at zero point before the outbreak of the war. Usurping the prerogatives of Providence, we had said "Let there be light," and we had assumed that there was light. We had abolished war by the simple process of "holding the thought."

Public interest has probably sunk to zero once more. By the same psychological processes we have ordained an era of "reconstruction," for which artillery is not needed. For these reasons there may be no large popular audience for General Crozier's book on our recent munition deficiencies.

No American artillery of the two most important calibres reached Europe before the armistice. The same is true of gas shells. The funds furnished for these purposes were prodigious, and the public was eager to know—at one time—what had become of them. We had munition scandals, and we had aeroplane scandals, but we shelved them all—until next time, which of course will never come.

In this volume General Crozier tells us all about it. It was the fault of a public emasculated by peace and dollars, which is patently true. A nation can not be put on a war footing over night. Factories can not be built by the waving of a wand. The task was incalculably great. A large part of General Crozier's book is devoted to the Lewis gun dispute. He surveys all the charges pro and con and presents us with the official view. It may be said that these facts give a distinctly changed complexion to the situation. At the same time they leave us with a somewhat distinct impression of what may be called leishureliness at headquarters, of a state of mind inappreciative of tremendous urgen-cies. The frequent repetition of placid official assurances that guns were being "developed," that "tests" would be undertaken on some nebulous future occasion, produce a certain irritating effect on the mind. Perhaps it could not be helped. It is not for the layman to say. But the layman does know that enormous sums of money were available, that the warnings of war were long and insistent, and that the most vital of munitions were still upon their way when the last shot had been fired.

ORDNANCE AND THE WORLD WAR. By Major-General William Crozier, U. S. A. New York: Charles Scribner's Sons.

"So Saith the Spirit."

This is a volume of so-called spirit communications, and the second to reach us from an author who describes himself as "A King's Counsel." The messages, says the author, reached him through his two daughters, who were using the planchette and who were in their normal state of consciousness. Apart from their supposed origin, they are good messages and far above the average.

The author can not understand why there should be any reluctance to adopt "the simple, natural, and obvious explanation for these writings that they are what they purport to be, messages from the spirits of persons who have passed from this life." We will cheerfully give him the explanation that he desires. His own volume is one of some hundreds of similar volumes, all purporting to describe the life after death. They are all in hopeless disagreement. For example, his own book argues strenuously against the theory of reincarnation. It is denied by the "spirits" with whom he thinks himself to be in converse. But on the table lies another book, quite as authentic as his own, quite as well written, and also based on communications with the dead. It is called "Claude's Second Book," by Mrs. Kelway-Bamber, and published by Henry Holt & Co. In this book we find strong assertions of reincarnation. It is assumed as a fact and its mechanism is described with diagrams. Which shall we believe? Either or neither? When the "spirits" are able to come in some sort of agreement among themselves we may pay some attention to their gibberings. Until then we shall favor the theory of "Cosmic Memory" to which "A King's Counsel" so much objects.

The Transit of Venus.

This is an extravaganza of the lighter kind, and with some rather venerable stage fittings. Some half-dozen of the maritally unfortunate set out on a voyage of scientific investigation and with the definite understanding that no women shall be allowed on board. Great is their consternation when they discover that the captain has surreptitiously introduced his niece as substitute for one of the party who had been prevented from sailing. Of course we know at once what will happen. The woman hates, one and all, fall in love with the niece, and as only one of them can marry her we are left in a state of more or less pleased uncertainty as to the identity of the lucky man. The story is fairly well told. Whether it was worth telling is another matter.

Two books for little children come from the Thomas Y. Crowell Company. The first is "Blueberry Bear," by J. L. Sherard, with illustrations in color by George Carlson, and the second is "Jane and the Owl" (sage brush stories), by Gene Stone, also with colored illustrations by the same artist.

A full and pleasantly written account of the lace factories of Belgium will be found in "Enchins of Belgium," by Charlotte Kellogg (Funk & Wagnalls Company). The author deals sympathetically with the human aspects of the industry, while her fifty-one full-page illustrations of lace patterns and the many smaller cuts of stitches and meshes make it a delight to the lace lover. The price is $2.

E. P. Dutton & Co. have published a second and revised edition of "Lectures on Industrial Psychology," by Bernard Muscin. There seems to be as much psychology as psychology in this treatise, and perhaps it is well to remember that the higher and by far the most important psychological processes—conscience, for example—are not to be measured by any mechanical process whatsoever. The price of the book is $3.

The Eve of Pasqua.

The first of these sixteen short stories is decidedly the best, although all of them are good of their kind. It concerns two Spanish girls, sisters. One of them goes to the city to be an actress and returns to her home with the supposed stain upon her of an evil life and the resulting death of a suitor. She is recognized by the ignorant populace and stoned in the street, but escapes through the aid of a young Englishman and is restored to her sister. The two girls wait for night and then go toward their home, but are met by the arena bulls and one of them is gored to death. The report is spread that Providence has wreaked its vengeance upon the guilty girl, but we are allowed to know that it was the other one who was killed, and that before she died she persuaded her sister to connive at the deception in order that the past might be forgotten and opportunity be afforded for a new life. Mr. Dehan tells his stories vigorously and they are all of them worth telling.

THE EVE OF PASQUA. By Richard Dehan. New York: George H. Doran Company.

Atlantida.

This story, translated from the French, might have been a collaboration by Jules Verne and Rider Haggard. It describes the discovery in Central Africa of a surviving remnant of the lost Atlantis. The country is governed by a supremely beautiful woman whose amusement it is to give herself in love to the rare travelers who discover her domain. When she successively discards them they die of grief and are then petrified by an ancient process and preserved in a sort of museum. The story is told by a French officer who has already visited Atlantida and escaped the toils of the temptress, and who is now about to attempt a second incursion to the same region. Apart from the interest of the adventure the author includes a surprising amount of information, presumably authentic, on the subject of African exploration and the various trade routes of antiquity. This is the sort of thing that Jules Verne would have done. Rider Haggard might have conceived the character of the lovely ogress who is the central figure of the story.

ATLANTIDA. By Pierre Benoit. Translated by Mary C. Tongue and Mary Ross. New York: Duffield & Co.

Freethinkers.

It seems hard to believe in the religious bigotries of a generation or so ago—until we realize that we are just as bigoted today, although in a different direction. Our fathers may remember the Rev. Frederick Denison Maurice, professor of English literature and theology at King's College. Maurice did not quite believe in the hell of the then-existing orthodoxy, and so the authorities came to the conclusion that his views "regarding the future punishment of the wicked and the final issues of the day of judgment are of dangerous tendency, and calculated to unsettle the minds of the theological students of King's College." And so Maurice was deprived of his position, but today we remember Maurice and have wholly forgotten his persecutors.

Maurice is the first of the six freethinkers to whom Mrs. Courtney devotes her book. The other five are Matthew Arnold, Huxley, Bradlaugh, Leslie Stephen, and Harriet Martineau. She regrets that Huxley gave so much time to the Gadarene swine. Today we are not interested in the Gadarene swine and we can not understand why any one should ever have been interested in them. Bradlaugh, says Mrs. Courtney, was no philosopher, but he was a great fighter. He did much to give us religious liberty and perhaps we have somewhat forgotten our great debt to these heretics and the gratitude that is their due. There is no finer courage than the courage which attacks a received opinion, just as there is no such blind cruelty as is summoned to the defense of those opinions. We no longer trouble ourselves about the Gadarene swine, nor allow ourselves to be worried by thoughts of a material hell. But perhaps our minds are not actually freer than they were fifty years ago. The accepted ideas have changed, but not the resentment with which we repel an attack upon them.

Mrs. Courtney has done her work very well, although without any marked literary merit. She shows us the lives of the men about whom she writes and how they suffered and fought. If we draw the right lessons from her narratives we shall be well repaid.

FREETHINKERS OF THE NINETEENTH CENTURY. By Janet E. Courtney, O. B. E. New York: E. P. Dutton & Co.

Gossip of Books and Authors.

Announcement is just made by the University of Chicago trustees that Director Charles Hubbard Judd of the School of Education, who is also head of the department of education in the university, has been made chairman of the department of psychology to succeed Professor James R. Angell, who resigned to accept the presidency of the Carnegie Corporation of New York. Director Judd, who formerly was professor and director of the psychological laboratory at Yale University, has been president of the American Psychological Association and editor of the monograph supplements of the Psychological Review. He has written a general introduction to psychology, as well as a recent volume on "The Psychology of High School Subjects."

Professor James Henry Breasted, Ph. D., LL. D., chairman of the department of Oriental languages and literatures and director of the Oriental Institute of the University of Chicago, will be the next convocation orator at that institution. This will be the one hundred and seventeenth convocation of the university and will be held on Friday, September 3d.

A number of the faculty of the University of Chicago are contributors to a new volume, "Ideals of America," issued under the auspices of the City Club of Chicago. Professor John Merle Coulter, head of the department of botany, has contributed "Ideals in Science," Professor Robert Morss Lovet of the department of English has a contribution on "Ideals in Literature," and Frederick D. Bramhall of the department of political science one on "Ideals in Politics."

A notice from the Century Company that a seventh edition has been ordered of "Italian Villas and Their Gardens," recalls the fact that Edith Wharton has done distinguished work in literary lines other than fiction. This is one of those volume of a sort of golden age of book-making. Over half of the forty-one illustrations are by Maxfield Parrish—which would represent a small fortune nowadays for the drawings—and fifteen are reproduced in full color. The text is printed in two colors on special plate paper. If the drawings and plates were made today, such is the high cost of book-making, the price of the volume would probably be somewhere around fifty dollars.

A book which will interest the many readers of verse is "A Study of Poetry," by Bliss Perry, which the Houghton Mifflin Company will publish in August. It covers the subject from the background in the far past down to the present day, but it is the present of which the author writes the most fully. Coming from a writer of Mr. Perry's scholarship and fine literary enthusiasm, this book will undoubtedly be an authority from the day of its appearance.

"SATIRES OF 1920."

Gorgeous in the extreme is the production of the Fanchon and Marco show at the Curran. It is a Californian revue, being gotten up on this Coast by the enterprising pair of dancing partners. There is money in this line of entertainment, for it is the sort of thing that men turn out in shoals to see. The fact that they had "Follies" at the Columbia and now "Satires" at the Curran indicates that these are rivals in the same line as the original "Follies," because they can always count on a big male following. They provide the authentic girl-and-comedy prescription for the business man's particular line of American fatigue.

The girl part of the show was all there, by the score. How in the world they can rake in so many pretty girls for the show business is a problem, unless they are largely depending for these various traveling shows on a local chorus. But there is an astonishingly large number of pretty girls in the world. We see them on the streets, in the shops, in the business offices, besides showing up gayly at social affairs. And the girls in the "Satires of 1920" are very pretty, and there is no doubt whatever about their symmetry. Not the least in the world. Why, those girls in the gypsy dance, when they were all spinning around in concert—well, considering the outwardly decorous appearance of the band just before and after the crucial moment, it made the particular effect I hint at seem just about the most daring of any of the numerous near-nudities that we have seen on the stage since the war left off. The war and its aftermath of demoralization is, of course, knocking maiden modesty clean out of the running, as it did in France after that little '93 affair. And what the girls don't bring about in the line of radical innovations the theatrical showmen can be entirely depended upon to further, for the good of the box-office.

They have, however, other scenery besides girl-scenery in the "Satires"; really beautiful effects, with a striking manipulation of lights. This gypsy scene and the Shrine of the Zunis were alike immensely striking and effective. The scenery was painted by Alexander, and he will doubtless receive many compliments and commissions as the result.

There is a lot of the usual comedy work in the "Satires" very well done by John Sheehan, who gives an excellent take-off of an impetuous British scenario-shifter; by Arthur West, who was a number of things, all of them done with genial competence; by Messrs. Lloyd and Wells, excellent blackface comedians and wonderful dancers, and by Al Wohlman.

Fanchon and Marco were more to the fore than usual, giving several of their whirlwind dances and doing some good burlesquing besides.

Marco's talents in jazz music were exhibited in "The Birth of Jazz," the number being ably helped out by some particularly clever instrumental comicalities by Messrs. Sieger and Wolf. In fact the dancing pair demonstrated pretty thoroughly that their versatility was not covered by the business acumen they had displayed in getting up this mammoth show.

One of the successful points about it is the new personnel. But new though some of the performers are, the work shows no signs of rawness. On the first night things went smoothly, for there had evidently been an enormous amount of rehearsing. The play, or performance rather, is divided up into fifteen "incidents," with widely varied settings and costumes. The girls dance beautifully, Muriel Stryker being particularly spectacular in her youthful grace and agility. They have a prima donna, Eva Clark by name, who is young, fresh-voiced, and pretty.

There is some sort of a plot in the beginning of things, but everybody, including the audience, forgot it eventually, although Jean Havez, who was responsible for the book, succeeded in supplying very entertaining matter while the story was on. But spectacle and specialties squeezed it out eventually. Besides those people already mentioned there was a lot of good work done by other performers, the evening's entertainment being, on the whole, rather too generous in quantity. There were a lot of lyrics, by the way, both lyrics and music being contributed by the indefatigable Fanchon and Marco, and the locally well-known Charles Sieger ran the orchestra with his well-known expertness.

"THE HUMMING BIRD."

Maud Fulton has written her second play. She has not rushed into it and galloped through with it because she felt pretty sure of the public's support, but she has evidently written it thoughtfully, deliberately. She has, as in "The Brat," abjured the stereotyped. Her story has a certain freshness and novelty. There is a French element in it, for Toinette, the little fitter, and the character that is impersonated by Maud Fulton, is a Parisian transplanted to America. As a general thing writers and playwrights who introduce a French character in their stories throw in a lot of cheap and obvious French, such as "Mon Dieu!" "Voilà!" and so on. And as it is scarcely fair to traduce these two perfectly good French expressions, I will add that the type of writers I refer to make them cheap and obvious by the way they use them. Maud Fulton, however, hit on a much better scheme. She made Toinette speak English all the time, with piquant little foreign turns to her American slang and colloquialisms which made us hang delightedly on her accents. And furthermore, in order to give the requisite French flavor to her heroine's speech, Maud Fulton had evidently listened attentively to French people who speak English with an accent. At least that is the way it impressed me, because Toinette's accent dropped from her lips so naturally and Frenchly.

Evidently the talented author is an uncommonly capable little citizen. She can dance well, do vaudeville stunts well, and act well. Acting is not the same thing as merely entertaining the public, and Maud Fulton was mastering the art of acting all those years while she was a dancer and stage entertainer. That is to say, she knows how to slip under the skin of the character impersonated, and remain that character, completely and consistently, every minute that she is on the stage.

In the character of the Humming Bird, who is a Parisian Apache, Miss Fulton showed considerable ingenuity in her idea of making him dumb. It saved a repetition of the French accent, and added to the prestige of terror attached to the Humming Bird.

The story opens in an artist's studio, and we are plunged immediately into absorbed interest and a Bohemian atmosphere. All of the four characters living in this Bohemian world are racy, original, witty, and all but one lovable. The exception is a mannequin, very handsome, very tough, and very dissipated. She is rather a hard citizen and we are sorry for the artist, who has been caught in her snare and who is rapidly becoming disillusioned.

The intrepid authoress also lands us in a smart and prosperous interior, but she makes the wealthy and presumably worldly Henrietta Fish unconventional, slightly eccentric, warm-hearted, and dowered with a large-sized bump of humor. Miss Fish is the crisply loving aunt of one of the lovable Bohemians, a delightful, irreverent, true-blue American, full of fun and fancy; one of the type, as he says of himself, who are obliged to pass their lives joking so that the world will not discover how soft-hearted they are and laugh at them.

The story hinges on a peril that threatens Toinette, the kind, merry, helpful, domestic little French fitter, who cooks and darns for the two Bohemians, mothering them gayly, and perplexing them at times by the shadows from the past that revisit her mobile countenance.

Miss Fulton plays the rôle delightfully, looking the slip of youth that Toinette is; and if at times a look of maturity and care dims Toinette's gaiety, there is warrant for a girl who has toiled for a bare living in the poverty-haunted precincts of Montmartre to wear a look that shadows forth a sad precocity. Miss Fulton plays the character with love, for she has lived with it for months, and knows Toinette's aspiring soul as no other actress could know it.

The company surrounding her, too, is excellent. Not a rôle but is well played. That flavor of freshness and originality to the play extends to the characters. Without any evidence of undue or inartistic contriving it seems as if every principal had his or her moment when we were permitted to glimpse the real soul of them. Harlan Tucker made the audience love Philip Carey when he told his love to Toinette, because under the youthful gaiety and nonsense we detected the true and gentle manliness. Florence Oberle made us warmly like the woman she impersonated, whose wealth had failed to make her spirit superciliously conventional. Leah Penman gave an uncommonly clever representation of Billie, the calculating beauty to whom manly love meant merely a complaisant wage-earner with a full purse. Miss Penman has beauty and style, happily reinforced with intelligence and a very good equipment of histrionic ability.

Paisley Noon, as the silent Apache, did a particularly forceful, expressive, and feeling bit of pantomime, and the Apache dance between the Montmartre pair was charged with that sense of an electric spark ready to burst into flame which was designed by the author to accompany the fateful presence of the silent fugitive.

Arthur Stuart Hull gave a pleasant flavor of sterling manliness to the character of the artist, and both he and Harrison Tucker made the persiflage of the men particularly enjoyable by the ease, gaiety, and naturalness with which it was expressed. Other characters were the Irish couturière with the imitation French nationality; which allowed for a contrast to Toinette's neat, quiet Gallicisms; this one was well played by Grace Travers, who presented an array of appropriately efflorescent charms for the subjugation of Mme. Burque's business manager, who matched his employer's imitation French by a varnish of imitation English, extremely well done by Ernest Anderson.

Pretty Marie Walcamp, with her delicate features and girlish sweetness, was well placed in the rôle of Lisa, who in her talk with Toinette showed a gentleness of nature that won our sympathies. Henry B. Walthall completes the list of principals, this actor appearing as the great French sleuth who, like the majority of the characters, loved kindness for its own sake.

Evidently Miss Fulton is an optimist about human nature, and she likes to have an audience leave with their hearts full of softened, kindly sentiment. Add to this she has given us a capital story and dialogue that is both natural and witty. And, if you like, you can draw a moral from the play, for we gather that in the war devoted service to one's country made Frenchmen grateful and forgiving even to the ruthless Apaches.

THE ORPHEUM.

Heaven can be found at the Orpheum for the children this week, for they have a troupe of sixteen performing midgets. Once upon a time it was just enough to be a midget to make the public gape and pay. But these tiny humans in miniature are a talented lot, and have been carefully trained for the show business. Their act is a complete and quite wonderful show in itself, and the midgets demonstrate the possession of a variety of talents. They sing, dance, play on instruments, do circus stunts, including trick riding and a strong-man act; they juggle and work Chinese magic—or one of them, the tiniest atom in

The Tired Wrist

The home-gardener who waters his flowers by hand usually pays a smaller water bill than the man who uses a "standing irrigator."

The wrist that directs a garden hose gets tired about the time the flowers have had enough water.

The "standing irrigator" never grows weary—it keeps revolving and spraying as long as the water is on.

Of course it is convenient to start the "standing irrigator," and then go away to do something else.

But it is inconvenient to forget all about it for an hour or more.

And that is what usually happens.

Meantime, the water meter does not forget about it—all the water wasted by a "standing irrigator" is measured by the meter.

The "standing irrigator" not only increases the water bill—it frequently injures the garden.

For the garden which is watered with a "standing irrigator" generally gets too much water.

Too much water leaches out and sours the soil.

Too much water is as bad as too little.

If you don't mind a tired wrist you will pay less for garden water and get better results.

the group, does; they do lariat whirling in the cowboy act; the men and women together—it really seems ridiculous to call them men and women, but they are adults—do a splendid stunt in fancy marching, and the girls vamp and showgirl, while the tiny Sandow simply takes our breath away by his strength and the feats which exhibit it.

And after all these various specialties—the doing of which went without a hitch—were over and done with, along came Carl Becker, a manly-looking midget who is an elephant trainer. Three fine, docile, splendidly trained elephants were on the stage going through their accomplishments as if they loved it. And strutting around among their moving forests of mighty legs was their infinitesimal trainer. Dressed in Oriental costume, more mature in countenance than the others, he dominated the huge beasts with his voice, running nimbly up their trunks and over their backs, as much at home on those moving mountains of flesh as if they were terra firma. It is always rather awe-inspiring to look at these trick elephants and realize how easily they could break up a show if they wanted to and violently project all human participants and on-lookers into kingdom come. That, of course, is one of the elements in the enjoyment of it. Only, the men behind the show always know their elephants and their dispositions pretty thoroughly and only select their most intelligently tractable charges for this kind of work.

This special trio are an unusually handsome collection, their rippling hides lighter than ordinary in color, and it seemed to me they were more intelligent in expression. In fact they seemed like patricians in elephantland; and as a special mark of distinction two of them have tusks.

It was interesting to observe the midgets' countenances. They are nearly all quite young, some of their faces being rather childlike. Their voices, too, are undeveloped, but all the same they are a mighty smart, brisk, reliable group of show-people.

Among the girls they have their special performer, one of whom, Dora Vieg, as Cleopatra, and the vamp-in-chief, was costumed with extreme gorgeousness. She also sang in a voice of midget quality.

Louis Vaschek, their strong man, has a remarkable chest circumference, his whole, compact little body being builded for strength. And the inconceivably minute Chong, rather older than the rest, was a deft performer of Oriental magic.

There were constant changes of scenery to set off the ten acts, very striking, most of it, which was accounted for by the fact that the sets were the work, some of them, of Joseph Urban, the others coming from the H. Robert law studios. The women's costumes were made in Paris, and the little creatures, some of whom were quite pretty, looked like living dolls as they marched, danced, and sang, their 'little bodies, as far as I could make out, being correctly proportioned.

In fact the troupe seems to have been selected for youth, health, looks, symmetry, and intelligence, only one of the men noticeably departing from the normal type in his build.

There are other features in the week's bill which, while very much enjoyed by adults, would also make a decided appeal to juvenile interest, one of them, "Artistic Rag Pictures," while not in the least artistic, being most cleverly contrived and the pictures very spirited, while it was entertaining to the audience to watch the deft manipulation of the "rags," and see the pictures grow visibly.

"Sassy Lillian Gonne," who is costumed in rompers and presents a very successful imitation of an enfant terrible, would also tickle the young people by her sudden darts of childish mischief and her general tomboyishness. She is a clever little being and a highly successful entertainer.

Georgia Campbell's "Gone Are the Days" has Southern atmosphere and the audience vastly enjoyed the old songs, which are very pleasingly sung by Miss Campbell and by a trio with mellow, non-yelling voices.

"The Futuristic Jail Bird" is pretty good, two girls warble acceptably in "Moments Musical," Dooley and Storey are good dancers, the man of the pair being able to monologize and do rope-spinning simultaneously, and can tell funny stories with a suggestion of honest foolishness about him that might mask his real cleverness if he were not so successful and such an amusing entertainer.

The programme closes with a lot of whirlwind repartee between the stage and a stage-box, in which there is some excellent fooling by three men, one of whom, Pasquale, sings with Latin charmfulness.

JOSEPHINE HART PHELPS.

New History on Old Battlefields.

In A. D. 106 one of Trajan's generals conquered Petra, the ancient city of the Nabatheans in Arabia, and created the Roman province of Arabia Petraea, but the city continued to flourish as a trade centre under the strong peace of Rome. In those days Petra was the focusing point on the caravan route from the interior of Arabia, Persia, and India to Egypt, Palestine, and Syria. It was a great safe deposit of fabulous wealth, fortified by frowning cliffs. When Roman power waned the Romanized Nabatheans were unable to withstand the desert hordes. The caravan trade was diverted through other channels, and Petra declined in importance.

A little more than a century ago John Lewis Burckhardt, a Swiss traveler, who had heard rumors of a great city of rock lying far out on the fringe of the Arabian Desert, penetrated the gorge and found once more this wonderful old city of Petra, which had not been mentioned in any literary record since A. D. 536. In the century or more since Burckhardt wrote of his discovery of the rock city in a letter from Cairo only a few explorers and archaeologists from the West have visited Petra. The journey is so long and arduous and the danger of violence from Bedouin nomads so great that not many have had the time or zeal to attempt it. The lion and the lizard kept the court where Jamshyd gloried and drank deep until Thomas Lawrence brought his fighting Bedouins into this city of tombs and empty palaces.—Lowell Thomas in Asia.

When the United States was sending Bolsheviks to Russia, Lenin made a most delicious remark about it: "I want America to understand that she can not dump her anarchists on Russia." The American deportees were put to work by their Soviet "comrades" and did not like it. It is pretty hard for an American agitator, who can make $50 to $100 a night by incendiary speeches in the United States, to find upon his arrival in glorious Soviet Russia that he must work at hard labor for his board.

Eliminating extravagance, and buying only essentials, the English middle classes are bringing down the cost of living. Many shops have large stocks at hand which they are forced to sell at reasonable prices to avoid greater loss.

FOYER AND BOX-OFFICE.

The Columbia Theatre.

Maude Fulton has returned to San Francisco, this time appearing in a new play from her own pen entitled "The Humming Bird," and the Columbia is assured of unusual prosperity during the coming week, the final one, by the way, for this popular star and company.

Miss Fulton is seen in the rôle of Toinette, a character of the Paris underworld, who has graduated from the Apache life and is seen at a modiste's establishment as a fitter. Nothing of the lower Parisian life is pictured in the play, the three scenes being laid in New York.

Miss Fulton seems the ideal actress for the new rôle created by her, just as she was in "The Brat." Her personality and acting are all that could be desired.

Oliver Morosco has supplied a well-nigh perfect cast, including as it does well-known players of stage and screen, among whom will be found Henry B. Walthall, Marie Walcamp, Paisley Noon, Arthur Stewart Hull, Ernest Anderson, Grace Travers, Frank Whitson, Leah Penman, Florence Oberle, and Mildred Cates.

The Curran Theatre.

As a producing centre for revues San Francisco has become a large factor in the theatrical world. This became assured through the instantaneous hit scored by Fanchon and Marco's "Satires of 1920," now playing at the Curran Theatre.

Last year the same producers won great success in "Let's Go," both on the Coast and Eastern tour. The present revue is something new in stagedom, a revue with a plot in which the motion-picture industry is satirized.

The marvelous dancing of the stars, Fanchon and Marco, the humor of the five comedians—Lloyd and Wells, Arthur West, Al Wohlman, and John Shean, the lilting voice of the prima donna, Eva Clark, and the budding beauty and charm of the girls find ready favor.

The book of the production, by Jean Havez, eclipses his work for Ziegfeld's Follies, which brought him fame, while the costumes are works of art.

The Alcazar Theatre.

The Alcazar lends attentive ear to the popular demand, so here comes "Peg o' My Heart" again next Sunday. There will be no change in the "Peg" cast so enthusiastically acclaimed on its former appearance. Triumphs were won by Inez Ragan as the witching little Irish-American lass, Dudley Ayres as the magnetic Jerry, Emelie Melville in her original character of the proud British matron, Ben Erway and Emily Pinter as the priggish brother and sister, Brady Kline as the amorous Brent, Rafael Brunetto as the family solicitor, and Al Cunningham as the haughty butler.

"Daddies," to follow Sunday matinée, August 29th, for the first time on the Pacific Coast, is another special manifestation of David Belasco's brotherly affection for the Alcazar. It ran over 500 times at his own New York theatre and made conquest of England and Australia. It is one of his most cherished possessions, this wonderful comedy of love, laughter, and humanity, depicting the perplexities of the club of confirmed American bachelors who adopted a group of delightful little foreign war-waifs.

The Orpheum.

Due to their extreme popularity and the peculiar interest they hold for children and grown-ups, Singer's Midgets are held over one more week at the Orpheum.

The turn, as thousands of San Franciscans have witnessed this week, consists of thirty tiny men and women in a variety of scenes and exhibiting such an assortment of skill as seldom has been witnessed. A large menagerie of animals accompanies the act.

An entirely new bill of vaudeville accompanies Singer's Midgets' second week. Clarence Oliver and Georgie Olp will be seen in "The Bee Hive," their latest and said to be their neatest offering for advanced vaudeville.

Lovett's Concentration is described as a real mystery, embracing music, science, and mirth. A revelation in mind-reading and psychic power entirely different from that offered by other acts coming under this description is their accomplishment.

Jimmy Duffy and Mr. Sweeney, two lively young Yanks, will indulge in a "kidding" number, built on American lines of humor. Dave Harris, one of vaudeville's foremost syncopationists, will be heard in a variety of numbers. W. Horlick and Sarampa Sisters will be seen in descriptive dances. John Orren and Lillian Drew will offer their "barnyard" episode. Arco Brothers will prove their claim to being athletes supreme. Topics of the day and Orpheum Concert Orchestra are other featured numbers.

Crowning a Pagoda.

A curious festival was held not long ago in Mandalay, the chief town of Burma. A new pagoda dedicated to the Buddhist religion was to be completed by the placing of a huge crown or thii upon its summit, more than 300 feet above the ground.

To witness the ceremony came Buddhists from Indo-China, from the Himalayas, from Laos and Chan and Siam. Warriors from Katschin, sorcerers from Mot, and people from other places made a medley of languages like that at Babel.

On a street corner would be seen a barber pulling a customer's tooth. On another corner a Mohammedan bird dealer sold caged paroquets to Buddhists who piously set them free. At very modern booths one could buy ice-cream, soda, or tea. Mandalay was a gorgeous spectacle and the new pagoda was the centre of it.

Every pagoda has at its summit a thii, or cap, the placing of which is often a herculean task. The one now to be raised weighed several hundred pounds and consisted of a gilded ball and crown and a great spindle above it.

To get it to the top an inclined plane of bamboo scaffolding like a huge toboggan slide had been built, and was decorated with silk flags and umbrellas. Up the inclined plane the heavy cap was slowly pulled up. Six days were required for the ascent and a seventh to fasten it in place.

The South Sea Islanders have a curious method of salutation, which is to fling a jar of water over the head of a friend.

VANITY FAIR.

The Russian aristocrats of the old régime were certainly neither wastrels nor fools if we may judge from their representatives who were left stranded in France by the coming of the revolution. Most of them were without money except what they happened to have in their pockets. They could get nothing from Russia, for their estates had been seized. And the French government would do nothing for them because they represented a nation that had become unfriendly. Perhaps there is no such test of capacity and character as to be thrown upon one's own resources in a foreign country.

But most of these men seem to have met the test and passed it with honor. Colonel Doroschewik and some of his comrades, knowing all about automobiles from their hours of ease, opened a motor repair shop. Count Paul Ignatieff and his mother, the Princess Mestchersky, started a model dairy farm at St. Cloud. Their available money was just enough to buy the land and to stock it. There was nothing left for wages, and so they did their own work, and they knew how to do it, thanks to the experience they had gained on their vast estates in Russia. They knew all about the making of Swiss cheese, and they used their knowledge to such good effect that their products are known everywhere in Paris. They are democratic people, and such servants as they have are invited to sit with them at table and are considered as members of the family.

Among other Russian aristocrats who find it better to work than to weep are Prince Lyszevsky and Captain Thoe of the Imperial Guard, who found desks in a hank and who seem to have no difficulty in doing their new duties. Colonel Skouratoff grows salads, and Prince Goudacheff, formerly Russian ambassador to Spain, and Prince Dadeshkilian have become farmers. Prince Boris and his wife, having an eye for the good, the beautiful, and the true, have opened a decorating and painting business, and are doing well. There are very many other Russians in Paris who seem quite able and willing to withstand the slings and arrows of outrageous fortune and to wrest victory from defeat.

Here in America we sometimes profess to be mightily amused when we hear that the great ones of the earth have been forced to get their living just like mere human beings. As a matter of fact we do not know who are the great ones of the earth until the acid test has been applied. How many of us would make much of a showing if we were suddenly to find ourselves, say in Petrograd, and without visible means of support, as they say in the police courts. If these Russian aristocrats who are now doing such good and manful work in France represent a caste that has been overthrown it seems to be about time that it was restored.

The members of the German royal family show up in a very inferior light in comparison with the Russians. Immediately after the German revolution it was said that one of the Kaiser's sons was selling automobiles, but apparently the sales were a little slow, for we heard nothing more about it. Since then another son has committed suicide as the readiest way to pay his debts, and now we are told that the other princes are frequent visitors to Holland, not that they may gaze with awe upon the imperial and paternal countenance, but that they may relieve their temporary financial embarrassments from the imperial and paternal exchequer. But these efforts to "touch" dear father are usually failures. Dear father has little enough of his own, and the renovating supplies from Germany are neither so regular nor so substantial as might be wished. The Kaiser's fortune that he took with him into Holland was about $340,000, but out of this amount he had to buy his house and to furnish it, and when that had been done the balance was not a very large one. It is said that the royal princes have invariably gone empty away unless they were so fortunate as to find the empress with a little money in her purse, which they showed no reluctance to accept. The last visit that the Crown Prince paid to his dear parents was said to have what may be called a financial motive, but the gleanings were decidedly poor. His mother had very little to give him, but she made him a present of some chairs and tables, which he carried back with him to his cottage in Wieringen.

One wonders what these weird and dreadful people think about. We may suppose that the Kaiser thinks about the past and the Crown Prince about the future. There we have the difference between youth and age. Age looks backward and youth looks forward. It may be that we could avoid old age, or at least postpone it indefinitely if we would compel our minds to turn away from the past and to look only toward the future. The man who indulges in reminiscences is old, no matter how old he is, if the paradox may be allowed. To look steadily toward the future is very much of a guarantee that we shall witness it. The future is full of interest, speculation, enthusiasm, and no man grows old so long as he preserves his interest and his enthusiasm.

Reminiscences are usually melancholy. It is the shadows that we see as we look backward and the reproachful might-have-beens. Dante said, "Nessun maggior dolore che ricordarsi dal tempo felice nella miseria." The citation may not be quite correct, but some chance should be given to the critic who is always anxious to say so. Let it go unverified. Tennyson filched the same sentiment when he said, "For a sorrow's crown of sorrows is remembering happier days"—also unverified. Such must be the Kaiser's crown of sorrows as he reviews the splendors and the triumphs that were as unreal as are now his dreams of them. Was it not Byron who depicted the dreams of Napoleon—"thou throneless homicide." But the dreams of Napoleon must have been brighter than those of the Kaiser. At least Napoleon had the dreams of a personal supremacy for which he owed no thanks to birth, nor tradition, nor heredity. At least he fell sword in hand, the self-made master of men, overwhelmed by the fate that he had dared, single-handed, to challenge. Here at least there were no meannesses, no treacheries, no hypocrisies. If Ajax defied the lightning there was at least no shame in the destroying bolt.

The London Times laments the decay of English cookery. Cookery in English restaurants, says the Times, "decadent for many years, is almost a lost art. The local dishes for which the provinces had a just fame are no longer offered; the hotels and restaurants of the cities have ceased to specialize. From one end of England to the other a uniformity of high prices, of careless service, and incompetent cooking prevails. We offer no proof of our allegation. He who demands it either never visits restaurants or is served according to his merits. Many excuses—but all bad—have been suggested. There was a war and a scarcity of materials. Granted; but, to the artist, paucity of material is an opportunity and may be an inspiration. The Spartan justice of the food control, it is pleaded, arranged distribution so that hotels and restaurants were sacrificed to the masses of the people. We do not believe it, partly because we doubt if the bureaucrats had a real knowledge of the raw materials over whose allotment they ruled, still more because the light remains when there is no question of selective distribution. It is alleged that the new rich outdid public purveyors and absorb all the best ham, and meat, and vegetables. It would be good hearing that the greater spending power of these fortunate persons was exercised with discrimination, but the prices charged to customers at restaurants should give these a stout hold on any market. There is a cry that we suffer from the absence of foreigners, and that the English race, too proud to cook, must starve, like slave-making ants, self-deprived of their slaves by a gust of patriotism. The argument savors of propagandist internationalism, and must be hurriedly passed by. The real explanation is unfortunately simple and presents little hope of change. The fate of many an individual restaurant has fallen on restaurants in the mass. A new establishment is opened, unpretentious and excellent. The whisper goes round, and the tables are crowded by the elect. The rumor grows and reaches those who are content to dine on the advice of others, until in the end the modest home of art turns into a thronged palace of convention. The proprietor prefers riches to honor, and caters only for the ignorant. The dislocations of war, the difficulties of home life, and a wider distribution of money have prodigiously increased the restaurant habit in England, until those who know and care have been swamped by a multitude of customers who neither know nor care. The purveyors cater for the majority. And so cookery becomes a lost art in England."

A superintendent of weights and measures examining a country grocery store near Bridgeton, New Jersey, found no ounce weights, and the woman proprietor enlightened him with the information that sixteen candles weigh just a pound, and so when customers wanted an ounce of anything she used a candle as a weight; if they wanted two ounces she used two candles, etc. Now she has some regulation weights.

STORYETTES.

Grave and Gay, Epigrammatic and Otherwise.

There was not even standing room in the crowded electric car, but one more passenger, a young woman, wedged her way along just inside the doorway. Each time the car took a sudden lurch forward she fell helplessly back, and three times she landed in the arms of a large, comfortable man. The third time it happened he said quietly: "Haden't you better stay here?"

Dinah was a product of New Orleans, a big, plump "yaller gal," who could cook the finest dinners for miles around. One day a new butler appeared upon the scene, and Dinah's mistress noticed that she took a great interest in the man. At last her mistress could stand her curiosity no longer and asked, "Dinah, do you know that new man?" Dinah took another long and scrutinizing look and then slowly and reminiscently replied: "Well, I dunno, Miss Alice; but I think he was mah fust husband."

The commercial traveler met Sandy, the canny one, emerging from the postoffice. "Ah, Sandy!" cried the commercial, "it is good to see as prosperous a farmer as yourself—not forgetful of his country! You have been in the postoffice to purchase war bonds?" "Nay," said Sandy easily. "Oh. Then perhaps you have put a little money in the savings bank that it may help the country?" "Nay," "Well," said the traveler as a last resort, "I suppose that you have bought a postal order to send to some poor acquaintance?" "Nay, I've been in to fill my fountain pen."

With many sobs and repetitions the good woman had told her tale of woe to the English clergyman. It was full of "he sez" and "I sez," but the clergyman listened patiently until she had finished. "I'm sorry, my dear lady," he said, sympathetically. "Certainly your husband does seem to treat you rather unkindly. But remember that you took him for better or for worse." "Well, it's allus been for wuss, s'far as I kin see," replied the visitor, dabbing her eyes with what only politeness could call a pocket handkerchief. "Have you tried to cure him with kindness?" pleaded the man. "Have you tried heaping coals of fire on his head?" "No, I aint, sir," replied the woman, grateful for the new idea. "So far, I've only tried 'ot water."

"Say," said the irate visitor, "you had something about me in your paper that has gotta be corrected." "If the item was wrong," the editor smoothly replied, "we shall cheerfully do as you request." "I told one of your reporters I saw a beautiful goldfinch perched on a twig just outside of my bedroom—" "Well—" "And when the item came out in the paper it read 'goldfish.'" "That isn't so bad." "Oh, isn't it, though? Well, ever since it was in the paper friends of mine have been hanging around our house thinking I have a private supply of something to drink in my cellar."

John Simmons had been an abstainer for twenty years but fell from the ways of grace and worshiped the vinous god with all the fervor of a convert. Feeling the need of recuperation, he sent his boy to an adjacent hostelry for a bottle of whisky. "But," cried the hotel proprietor, "who's it for?" "For my father," said the boy. "Nonsense. Your father is a total abstainer and has been to my knowledge for longer than you've lived." "Well, at all events, he sent me for it." "What does he want it for?" "To let you into a secret," said the boy, ashamed to tell the truth, "he's going fishing and he wants the cork to use for a float."

The smart young automobile salesman was trying to sell a car to a farmer who swore he would never set foot in one of the pesky things. Other salesmen had tried and had failed. "Now, Mr. Cornsilk," spoke the young man. "This bar here is the 'gid dap' rod. This iron thing here is the 'whoa' pedal. The other one is the 'back' pedal. This tin box is the feed bag. Of course this jigger here is the reins. Perfectly simple. I'd like to sell you this little nag." The farmer stroked his chin and looked like a man about to make an important decision. "Well, I dunno, young man. I might say 'yes' if you'd throw in a whip."

The family had been having an epidemic of colds and sore throats. Each received the physician's favorite prescriptions for powder and gargle. Finally the maid, a recent importation from Poland, fell ill. The lady of the house, Mrs. G—, tried to give her the powder and gargle, but she insisted on having the physician. And when the latter came he prescribed as usual. "Now, you see," said Mrs. G—, "he's giving you exactly the same things I took." "I von't take dem," responded the maid. "Doctor, you are a sensible man. I ask you, is id right a single girl should take de same medicine as a married voman vid children?"

Mr. Fairfax telephoned to his wife at 5 o'clock that he was bringing a party of six to dinner. An inventory of the larder showed short rations. So Bridget, the cook, was instructed to order certain supplies over the telephone. Wishing to supplement the order, Bridget's mistress followed her to the telephone and heard: "Oi wahnt yez to sind along a leg o' mutton and ask the grocer nixt door to let your boy bring two jillies and a tin of pears, an' if Oi don't get them quick Oi'll be along in the mornin' and paralyze ye all!" A brief pause, then: "Who's shpakin'? Sure, an' it's Mrs. Fairfax of the Cedars." "Bridget," cried the astonished and outraged mistress. "What do you mean? How dare you say such things?" "Sure, ma'am," returned the cook unconcernedly, "that's all right. I talks to 'em like that for you all the toime."

Aunt Lizzie, comfortably fat, a widow, and nearing middle age, met her fate in the person of a prosperous negro who owned a plantation and a good home. Her white friends thought she had done unusually well, and were glad. A few short months after the wedding ceremony, however, she came to see a family she had once cooked for, and when a young member of the group asked about her wealthy spouse, she said: "Law, chile, I done left that nigger. Him and me didn't get along a-tal." Surprised, the girl asked: "What on earth was the matter, Aunt Lizzie? I thought you married a fine man with plenty of money." "Had plenty of money all right," she replied. "Warn't but one thing wrong with him—he was sanctified. You know, one of dese here holiness men. Us hadn't been married no time befo' he told me I warn't as good as him. Said I was onregenerate. Den he stopped me fum drinking coffee, wouldn't let me wear my weddin' clothes, and said he'd quit me if I ever went near one of dese picture shows. And you know, honey, I loves my coffee, my clothes, and when I comes to town my picture shows. So I up and quits him." "You don't look sad about it," the girl said. "Aint sad, honey; aint sad. I got me a lawyer and tuk half dat nigger's plantation 'way fum him. Guess he wished when I done dat he hadn't been so sanctified."

Rashness of an Ancient.
Obelisk so tall and grand
Reared on the Egyptian sand,
Did some ancient Royal Boss
Carve upon you to his loss?
Do your hieroglyphics dim
Show the goods are caught on him?

Did he say that he was for
The unrighteous in the war?
Did he chisel thus his creed

Where I had rather eat
Than put the grandest moral thought
In verses chaste and neat;
As I perpend the ways of men,
It rather seems to me
The noblest souls, unfed, are not
As happy as might be.

It may seem quite unorthodox,
But candor hides me state,
The sustenance in purity
Is not so very great.
And as for earnest purposes
(Whose worth is not debated),
Their calorific content has Been somewhat overated.

I dare say you've observed, as I,
Though prudence gratifies,
It isn't quite as filling as
New England apple pies;
So if promises were negotiable
And hope and praise and zeal,
I think I'd cash them at the bank
And buy myself a meal.

—New York Evening Post.

Calling Cattle Home.

I sometimes wonder where the cattle calls heard in the North Carolina Mountains come from, syllables sedulously handed down from one generation to the next.

When the sheep come scuttling and scurrying with sharp, hurried bleatings across a pasture sown with boulders gray and shaggy as themselves, the cry that brings them to the salting is "sheep-in-nan, sheep-in-nan." When the cow bells are near at hand, their incessant clamor subdued by enfolding tree and bush, there is no need of calling the cows home, but when these are slow in returning from pasturage in the long gold twilight, then the cattle call of the mountains is a cry long to be remembered.

Some mountain woman, standing by the bars, suddenly straightens and breathes deep, then utters a rich yodel that rings and echoes far and far up the black-recessed coves where who knows what mysterious evening herdsman hold the cows. Patient, far-reaching, musical, it summons until the far bells reluctantly tinkle, and slowly come nearer and nearer; presently dusky horns and lumbering flanks emerge from deep forest gloom. While the cows shamble down to the home gate, from out the haunted ravine rings the sweet hell note of the wood thrush, chiming on and on, at recurrent intervals, until full darkness possesses the forest, when another bird begins, and the pathos of the whippoorwill issues from the wood like the swish of an elfin flail.—Winifred Kirkland in the Outlook.

"Piedmont Estates" Homesites

— IN —

The East Bay's Finest Residential Park

IN BEAUTIFUL PIEDMONT, commanding a most magnificent view of San Francisco Bay and the Marin County Hills.

THIS SUPERB residential Park is situated on the Sunkist slope of the Fashionable Piedmont District and is absolutely protected from disagreeable winds.

THIS PARK has been subdivided so the contours of the land give each homesite a natural setting. This will appeal to appreciative people, who desire something different from the ordinary flat level land without inspiration or artistic merit.

ONLY FIFTEEN of these remarkable homesites of from one to four acres; each one furnishing a most picturesque location for a home of dignity and refinement.

OVER ONE MILLION DOLLARS of Piedmont's finest homes adjacent to Piedmont Estates.

CAREFULLY RESTRICTED to home costing from $10,000 upward.

THIS UNIQUE LOCATION, the splendid plans prepared for the development of this beautiful residential Park, prepared by landscape Engineers of note, and the perfect building restrictions combine to make this a home place of distinctiveness and individuality.

Address by Rupert Hughes.

On the afternoon of the 20th of September the University Fine Arts Society will have its formal opening in the Colonial Ballroom of the Hotel St. Francis, with Rupert Hughes as its guest of honor. Mr. Hughes will deliver an address on "The Golden Age of Today." He is now preparing questions and answers on this subject which will be sent to the society in advance. These questions and answers will be sent to all members of the society and will comprise the first study course to be taken up on the programme. Mr. Hughes will address the University Fine Arts Society exclusively. He will appear nowhere else in San Francisco.

Among the recent charter members of the Fine Arts Society are Mrs. Kenneth Kingsbury, Mrs. Louis Parrott, Mrs. Cuyler Lee, Mrs. Sarah Winslow, Mrs. Alfred Oyster, Mrs. Philip Bowles, Mrs. W. G. Henshaw, Mrs. Arthur Page, Mrs. E. A. Selfridge, Mrs. Downey Harvey, Mrs. E. R. Breyfogle, Mrs. John Gallois, Mrs. Silas Palmer, Mrs. Cyril Tobin, Mrs. Alfred Tubbs, Mrs. Berthe Welch, Mrs. Albert Ehrmann, Mrs. A. B. C. Dohrmann, Mrs. Chauncey Pennoyer, Mrs. James Black, Mrs. Vincent Whitney, Mrs. R. I. Bentley, Mrs. A. M. Bancroft, Mrs. Emma Breeden, Miss Anna Peters, Miss Augusta Foute, Miss Lorna Williamson, Miss Mary Emma Flood, Miss Margaret Lee, Miss Constance Hart, Miss Josephine Grant, Miss Rosamund Lee, Miss Perris Coleman, Miss Hope Bliss.

Julian Huxley's account of experiments by himself and others with the thyroid gland, which appeared in the London Daily Mail, is far more wonderful than the romantic perversion of the matter which had found currency. It has been known for twenty years or more that this little gland in the neck regulates growth, and that it is deficient in imbeciles. Mr. Huxley has found that thyroid extract, if administered to the lower animals, stimulates their development in an astonishing way. Thus the small tadpole transforms itself prematurely into a frog, whereas, if its thyroid is removed, it remains a tadpole. Thyroxin, a substance which has been isolated from the thyroid, and which has also—this is a remarkable fact—been made by synthesis from inorganic chemicals, exerts "a most powerful effect" on men. Thus a dose of a milligram causes a man to work, chemically speaking, 2 per cent. more quickly than before. The ulterior effects of such a dose remain to be studied. Mr. Huxley's article confirms the belief, suggested by Professor Arthur Keith's recent paper on the interstitial and other glands, that the biologist and chemist working on these minute and obscure portions of the body may be on the eve of epoch-making discoveries as to the nature of life.—London Spectator.

An interesting substitute for ice is provided in some parts of Syria. Snow gathered in the mountains is packed in a conical pit dug in the ground and provided at the bottom with a drain to carry off the water formed—for some of the snow unavoidably melts. The snow is tamped firmly and covered with straw and leaves. From these pits the solidified snow is distributed to customers on pack-horses, and costs all the way from 10 to 25 cents per 100 pounds.

In many parts of Western Asia even tiny children have developed heaving into such an art that only the highly skilled eye can detect the real from the bogus cases of want. A Near East relief worker writes from Kermanshah that while walking along the street her attention was called to a four-year-old girl writhing on the ground. Her eyes were glassy and her cheeks flushed, and she seemed to be burning up with fever. At her side was a little fellow about the same age, tearfully heaving the passerby to give him money to help his poor little sister. The "relief lady" summoned an amulance from the Near East Hospital in the town and rushed the little girl off for immediate treatment. The doctors began to work over her anxiously, but found that there was absolutely nothing the matter. She was a trained street heggard, successfully shamming illness to arouse sympathy and to wheedle coins from people.

Alligators are becoming scarce in Louisiana because of the demand for skins from which suitcases and purses are manufactured. One company destroys an average of 10,000 alligators monthly. Government protection for alligators has been begun in some Southern states.

The issues in the primary election dated for Tuesday of the coming week are wholly partisan and personal. The parties are to choose candidates for a United States senatorship, candidates for Congress in eleven congressional districts, candidates for two justices of the State Supreme Court, and candidates for various district and local positions. In addition delegates are to be chosen by districts to the state party conventions and the several county central committees. California is essentially a Republican state. The Republican registration exceeded the Democratic in each of the fifty-eight counties. The record stands: Republican, 779,854; Democratic, 288,449; Socialist, 19,071; Prohibition, 19,117; scattered, 2500. Number of those declining to state party affiliation, 143,077.

Interest centres in the Republican nomination for the senatorship, it being a foregone conclusion that the Democratic nomination will go to Phelan, incumbent. For the Republican nomination there are three candidates, namely: Shortridge of San Francisco, Kent of Marin County, and Wallace of Los Angeles. Although California is essentially a Republican state it is represented in the Senate by Phelan, a Democrat. The fact is in itself an anomaly, and it becomes of grave significance in respect of the existing situation. By all omens the country is in the way of electing a Republican President, and a Republican President ought, if his service shall be effective, to have the support of a Republican majority in the Senate. At the present time the division between the two parties in the Senate is practically equal. It is therefore a matter of prime importance both locally and nationally speaking that California should send a Republican in the place of Mr. Phelan.

Curiously enough, two of the three candidates for the Republican nomination are only Republicans in a nominal sense. Mr. Kent, a man socially respectable, is a chronic eccentric, an avowed radical who may not be depended upon for party loyalty. Mr. Wallace, likewise socially respectable, is a man of uncertain political character and, like Kent, not dependably a party man. On the other hand Mr. Shortridge is a Republican of unquestioned conviction and of unquestioned loyalty. In the Senate there would be no doubt about his devotion to Republican principles or of his support of Republican policies. In the interest of California, which ought to share in the councils of the Executive, and of the country at large under the necessity of sustaining the incoming President, Mr. Shortridge ought to be nominated. Furthermore, the nomination of Shortridge would go a long way toward assuring Republican success in the November election. Besides being a dependable Republican he is at all points a stronger man than either of his rivals. Every consideration, therefore, that should have weight with Republican voters points to Shortridge as the man to whom the favor of the party should be given.

A Swap in Midstream.

The career of Mr. George White as the directing head of the Democratic national campaign turns out a brief one. He is, to save his face and to sustain appearances, to retain the nominal chairmanship. But actual powers will be in the hands of Representative Charles C. Cantrell of Kentucky under the title of "National Campaign Organizer."

The motives back of this swap of horses in midstream were indicated in the Argonaut of 14th inst. Mr. Homer Cummings, a friend of the President, was deposed at the dictation of the Taggart-Thompson-Tammany combine by which Mr. Cox's nomination was "put over" and which not unnaturally, as the game of politics goes, expected to have an active part in directing the campaign. Under this inspiration Mr. George White, former congressman, was made chairman. The selection did not please Mr. Wilson, and there was reason for it. When White was a member of the House of Representatives in 1914 he declined in somewhat spectacular fashion to take orders from the White House. He was especially obstreperous in the matter of the Alaska Railroad bill. Having spent several years in Alaska, he thought he knew what was needed there and he resolutely opposed the proposal for government ownership of the Alaska road. Choice of Mr. White as chairman of the committee was an attempt on the part of Mr. Cox to placate anti-Wilson sentiment in the party. It was thought that Mr. Wilson, following universal practice in such matters, would concede to Mr. Cox the right to name the head of the committee. It was further believed that the concession already made by Mr. Cox in accepting the Wilson programme in the matter of the league of nations would be sufficient to hold Mr. Wilson in line.

But it appears that Mr. Wilson was not so easily to be held in line. He refused or at least neglected to receive Mr. White at the White House and quite pointedly received others at a time when White was in Washington and anxiously waiting round in the hope of invitation to come and talk things over. The President has made no public announcement, but very evidently he has made it plain to Mr. Cox that support of the Administration was contingent upon putting the direction of the campaign into hands friendly to Mr. Wilson. Concession in the matter of the league of nations and of other points was not sufficient to bring and hold the presidential favor. Surrender to the presidential will had to be complete. Mr. White will not precisely be kicked out. He will be shelved. He will bear the title of chairman, but he will be an unused fifth wheel attached to the campaign coach. Mr. Cantrell will sit in the driver's seat. Mr. Wilson will really hold the reins.

This latest concession to the presidential will can not fail to be an embarrassment to Mr. Cox. Besides confusion incidental to a second change of leadership within a few weeks, it exhibits the candidate as a man lacking in the moral force of independent character. Further, it remains to be seen how the new deal will strike the Taggart-Thompson-Tammany outfit. Already there are rumors that Boss Murphy of Tammany is disgruntled, and there are those to suggest that his support of Mr. Cox from now on may be nominal rather than enthusiastic and effective.

Julius Kahn.

To the many disposed to despair of our American politics the Argonaut commends consideration of the case of Julius Kahn. Now for some twenty years Mr. Kahn has represented the Fourth California District (San Francisco) in the House of Representatives, and he is again a candidate upon whom all parties and factions are seeking to impose formal nomination. Mr. Kahn, so far from being a professional politician or a man of the ordinary politician type, is personally a gentleman and by profession an actor. So far from being a typical exponent of the policy of all things to all men, he is a man of definite and known principles. Racially and religiously he is a Jew, a fact not commonly reckoned as a political asset. He neither has nor has ever had a personal "machine," and if he had one he would have neither the art nor the lack of conscience essential to its effective use. Nobody, least of all himself, claims for Mr. Kahn supreme powers of constructive statesmanship. Nobody claims for him any other sort of genius than that which abides in intelligence, industry, plain common sense, strict integrity, straight manliness. Mr. Kahn represents a city and a district notable for varied types of social and political interest and of the varied forms of bias thereunto inherent and therewith associated.

Mr. Kahn is no dissembler. He coddles no interests. A friend of man in the abstract, he stands neither for the selfishness of capital nor for the radicalisms of labor. Devoted to the principle of personal liberty, he is opposed to sumptuary laws, including prohibition. Alien by birth—he was born in Germany—Mr. Kahn is an American through and through. Respectful of the opinions of others yet always coming to his own judgments by logical and moral processes of mind, Mr. Kahn stands amid the turmoils of the time four-square, a man unafraid. Thus for twenty years and more Mr. Kahn has illustrated at home and in Congress the virtues of independence, intelligence, courage, and industry in public service. And with process of time and with growth of authority based upon character and service, Mr. Kahn has become the foremost personality in the House of Representatives. He is a partisan—a Republican—not because he swallows party creeds and plat-forms by the gulping process, but because he believes that by and large the interests of the country may best be sustained through Republican policies. Yet three years ago in an emergency, when a Democratic party leader, misplaced in the chairmanship of the House Military Committee, turned tail as a pacifist, Mr. Kahn stepped to the front and took the leading part in support of a Democratic administration, carrying through to success a measure essential to the time and necessary to the maintenance of our national obligations.

No man has the temerity to contest the Fourth District of California with Mr. Kahn. To do so one would only make a laughing-stock of himself. Mr. Kahn does not have to look after his district—his district looks after him. And it honors itself in the doing. Thus we have an inspiring illustration of what a real man may do and of what powers he may gain, even in the sphere of politics, by scorning the tricks of demagoguery, by courses founded in intelligence and conscience, by standing ever a gentleman without fear and without reproach. If by these means so notable a success may be achieved in a district of San Francisco, why may it not be duplicated throughout the length and breadth of the land? The answer is that it may be done as Julius Kahn has done it whenever and wherever men of Julius Kahn's type—men of independence, men of intelligence, men of candor, men of character—go into politics.

The Future of Europe.

President Barrows of the State University is quoted in the daily press as declaring that "Europe will never again play a world rôle." This statement, we think, betrays a mind over-impressed by the material desolation of present-day Europe. It reflects a depression produced by immediate and pained observation from which Mr. Barrows has not yet had time to become sufficiently detached for sound reflection. He speaks as might one who fifteen years ago saw San Francisco a mass of broken walls and glowing ashes and whose imagination failed to vision the forces from which there would arise a new and mightier city.

Let us consider for a moment the basic conditions: The bulk of the white race—the race that has developed and which sustains Western civilization—abides in Europe. Tradition and habit, shocked as they have been by the great war and its aftermath, remain as profoundly potent forces and must ultimately reinvigorate the spirit and reinspire the minds of the European peoples. Europe holds, if not the highest developments of the scientific mind and of disciplined skill in the world, at least her full share in ratio with her population. Necessity, famed as the mother of invention, may be further defined as the inspirer of the spirit embodied in the phrase "carrying on." It is not too much to say that a world bereft of Europe would be a world measurably bereft of the higher forces in the modern world. In America and in various other parts of the world civilization has large and potential outposts, but when all is said and done her high court is in the older seats of ordered life, where the homogeneity of peoples holds a reserve power not to be found dependably in the human congeries of newer lands. If we are to believe that never again Europe would play a world rôle it would be to think of a world broken and lop-sided and to despair of its future.

We venture to remind Mr. Barrows that the world neither goes backward nor forward by leaps and bounds. Periods of decay as well as periods of progress do in truth come as do the ocean tides, but they come slowly—so slowly that their movement is usually unnoted except by minds of especial powers of observation and interpretation. Europe today is indeed a blasted and painful spectacle, but from the ruin and horror of the time we venture to prophesy a new Europe capable of carrying on the obligations of the old Europe. It is not unreasonable to hope that in the cataclysm of war there has perished much that has retarded the moral progress of Europe. The brutal autocracy that ruled Russia has been destroyed, and if for the moment anarchy is running a wild course it is not conceivable that a vital race in a practically virgin country will remain permanently in abject slavery to a group of selfish and blood-thirsty adventurers. German autocracy is in exile, but let no man believe that the vital resource, the knowledge, the skill, the discipline illustrated in the career of the German people in the last half-century has perished with the dynasty of the Hohenzollerns. Germany will rise again and in the spirit of better things. And is there anybody so fatuous as to imagine that the heroism and hardihood that inspired France and England in the war have been lost in the victory? Is it the lesson of human triumphs that they weaken the spirit and destroy the powers of those who have achieved them?

In the argot of the street, Mr. Barrows has another guess coming. The conditions of Europe are appalling, but only at the point of geographical magnitude is the prevailing distress more grievous than it has been at other and historical times. Europe will rise again, not precisely in the old image, but in forms new, and, we profoundly believe, purged of much that in times past has tended to restrain progress. Europe, so far from having no future part in world affairs, will, we have faith, speedily get into step with the new order of things and duly sustain her responsibilities to civilization.

Practicability vs. Ideality.

Senator Harding makes very plain his objection to participation on the part of the United States in a super-government of the world as proposed in Mr. Wilson's project for a league of nations. His hope is for such an association of nations as may by its promotion of knowledge and sympathy—by its moral powers—tend to peace of the world. Eager to coöperate with other nations in all proper ways, he objects to any arrangement that would so bind the Washington government as to limit its entire freedom of action in any situation. Mr. Harding's position is easily understandable and the carrying into effect of his idea is not difficult. It is not needful or practicable to retrace the whole ground traversed by the peace conference. It will be quite sufficient to accept the treaty as drawn subject to reservations limiting participation on the part of the American government. If the reservations suggested by the Senate are not deemed satisfactory, then something else similar in spirit may be substituted. The point is, not to define a complete scheme for a league or association of nations, but to establish a league or association, leaving its development to times, events, occasions. This we understand to be Mr. Harding's idea as distinct from the Wilson project worked out in schoolmaster fashion in theoretical detail.

Mr. Harding declares himself hopeful in connection with the work upon which Mr. Elihu Root is now engaged at The Hague in coöperation with representatives of various European powers. It is the project of establishing an international court to which international issues may be presented for critical examination and moral adjudication. There is the promise of vast service to the causes of justice and peace in such an institution. Once definitely established in the respect of the world and accepted in the practice of nations, its moral powers would be incalculable.

Somebody, we hope, may recall that when the editor of this newspaper returned last year from attendance at Paris upon the peace conference he predicted that out of all the pother and confusion of the time there would come, not a super-government of positive powers, but an enlargement of the character of The Hague Tribunal or a substitute for it of enhanced moral authority. The events of a year and a half since this prediction was made tend to accredit it as a bit of true prophecy. The world is not ready for a super-nation—for a "parliament of man." Probably it never will be. Interests, instincts, environments, temperaments are too diverse. The most that can be hoped for is a good understanding between the nations, with acceptance of simple standards of good faith and equity in international dealing. The idea which inspired the league of nations project was too idealistic for a practical world. And if even in course of time something in the character of a world organization may be brought about, it will not come full-armed. Nothing comes that way. Movements of peoples from one purpose or status to another are by degrees. Whatever dreams may be founded in hope of sudden and revolutionary changes in human thought, in human action, in human organization, are doomed to pass through the ivory gate.

H. C. L.

All the candidates talk glibly of cutting the high cost of living. Talk is cheap; and it may serve its purpose of cajoling the non-thinking voter. But pray, in the name of all the saints alive and dead, bow are we to have cheaper goods—lower costs of living—with constant advance in all the factors that go into the creation and delivery of food, clothing, and the varied necessities of life? Wages go up, interest on capital goes up, freight rates go up and tend to go still higher up, rents go up. In other days it was said that high rates and advanced wages implied greater efficiency, but we now find that the principle works the other way. For the ruling high wages the return in production is less than formerly. The shorter day yields, not only less in the final account, but less in the per hour ratio. Thus cost of production and cost of delivery of any product tends to advance rather than to decline. And so long as this condition prevails it is idle to look for reduction in the cost of living. Of course the upward movement can not go on indefinitely. There must come a time when the ability to pay will be a minus quantity. Then there will come a general smash; and nothing short of a general smash will bring down the cost of living.

Unseemly.

Governor Cox does not accredit himself or help his cause by charging that there is a "plutocratic conspiracy" backed by millions to "buy the presidency" for Senator Harding. The statement is stupidly untrue. If Governor Cox believes it, then he is easily duped; if he is merely using a scandalous fiction for campaign effect, his character is not what we have hoped and supposed it to be.

Approximately a year ago the Republican National Committee in a procedure publicly reported announced that individual contributions to the then coming campaign should be limited to one thousand dollars. Unless Chairman Hays and the other members of the national committee are a pack of liars—and nobody believes they are—that policy has been adhered to strictly. There has been no drumming for funds, no evidence of other than limited resource in the campaign treasury. For the first time in the history of our politics the record is open. And it is not impertinent to remark that there is less reason to suspect the Republican managers of concealed methods than the managers of Mr. Cox's campaign. The atmosphere of the Republican organization is quite as free from sinister suggestion as that of the Democratic management. When it is remembered that Governor Cox's nomination was "put over" by a combination of Tom Taggart of Indiana, Bill Thompson of Illinois, and Boss Murphy of Tammany Hall, something of the fine flavor of ideal purity seems lacking.

It has been hoped that this campaign would be conducted upon high ground. Senator Harding has said nothing and done nothing out of keeping with a dignified rivalry between gentlemen. Mr. Cox's reiterated charge tends to bring the campaign down to the low level of a shanty-town row; and if he shall persist in this sort of thing the effect will surely be to cheapen the campaign immeasurably.

Chairman Hays of the Republican Committee in express terms has denied Governor Cox's charge. It is to be hoped that he will not further descend. Nothing in the way of emphasis will be gained by repetition or recrimination. The country should be spared the shame of a mud-slinging spectacle. There is no argument in slander; still less in the too familiar arraignment "You're another."

Editorial Notes.

We are told that certain radical elements of organized labor are "gunning" for Judge Frank H. Dunne on the score of his firmness in the matter of the Mooney case. It will be recalled that in connection with this case Judge Dunne declined to yield to open threats that he would be beaten in his next candidacy. Since the enemies of justice are thus seeking to punish Judge Dunne for maintaining the integrity of his court, it becomes the duty of the friends of justice to rally to his support. This is the more important in view of the fact that Judge Dunne is confined to his home as a convalescent and is so unable personally to face and counteract the forces arrayed against him.

Between presidential candidate Cox and vice-presidential candidate Roosevelt there appears to be sharp competition as to which shall excel in the not over nice business of denunciation. Mr. Harding, Mr. Coolidge, Mr. Lodge, Mr. Root, and pretty much a leading men of the Republican party are let in for sound drubbing when either Mr. Cox or Mr. Roosevelt lifts his voice. It is not a pretty spectacle; it is not the sort of tactics that command approval and success. The public is not profoundly interested in what the rival candidates think of each other or in what they think of opposing partisan figures.

Only 11 per cent. of the women and girl workers in New York State belong to unions.

THE NEW WARS IN THE EAST.

The magic wand is waved once more over eastern Europe and the unexpected has happened. The Poles have won a great victory over the Soviet forces and have driven them headlong eastward and northward. The rout of the Reds is described as utter and complete. They have lost 75,000 prisoners and their dead and wounded must be correspondingly numerous. The battle still continues at the moment of writing, and we may presently hear that the Red armies have been herded into a position that will compel their capitulation. This startling success is of course due to the strategy of General Weygand of the French staff, and to the aeroplane and bombing services organized and probably supplied by France. It is due also to the lack of discipline in the Red forces and to the poison of military equality first injected into their veins by Kerensky.

But at the moment we are not concerned so much with the details of a great battle as with its results upon the general situation. What effect will it have upon the Bolshevik government? Will it shake its hold upon the Russian people, or will it serve to solidify the national sentiment behind the Soviet authorities? No one can foresee the psychological reactions of a nation, and particularly of an illiterate, emotional, and credulous nation. But at least we have some precedents in history: The armies of France after the great revolution were similarly corrupted by the demagogues of Paris, incited against their officers, and applauded for their insubordination. But they learned the lessons of inevitable defeat. The nation sustained the revolutionary government with redoubled energies. Discipline was restored in the armies, and France defended herself triumphantly against a monarchical Europe bent upon her destruction. It is easy to lay too much emphasis upon an analogy, but the resemblances between revolutionary France and revolutionary Russia are too strong to be ignored. Adopting every proper caution in our judgments, we may find that the Soviet government draws inspiration from defeat, and that its hold upon the Russian people has been strengthened. So far, every attack upon the Russian government has had just that effect.

Those who are disposed to believe that the Russian government had no intention to Bolshevize Poland, that it was doing no more than repel an act of aggression, would do well to read the memorandum issued from Lucerne by Lloyd George and Giolitti. Be it remembered that they are both friends of Russia and to that extent in opposition to France. Both want to resume commercial relations with Russia. Both have refused to use force against her. Lloyd George asked the Russian delegation to London for the terms on which Russia would make peace with Poland, and those terms were supplied, together with the assurance that they contained everything of an important nature. It appears now that this was untrue. There was another stipulation to which the Russian delegates made no reference, and it was to the effect that Poland, in addition to a small military army, was to raise a large civil army drawn from the workmen only—that is to say a Soviet army. Commenting upon this discredited suppression, Lloyd George and Giolitti remark: "The government of Poland is based on the choice of the whole adult male population of the country without distinction of class, and this so-called civil army to be drawn from one class only, which is referred to in the fourth condition of the Soviet terms, is only an indirect method of organizing a force to overthrow by violence this democratic constitution and substitute for it the despotism of a privileged few who may have absorbed the doctrines of Bolshevism." To add such a proposal to the peace terms after the assurance that the copy submitted was practically a complete one "is a gross breach of faith, and negotiations of any kind with a government which so lightly treats its word becomes difficult if not impossible." If the Soviet government, say the premiers, "notwithstanding the punishment which its aggression is encountering," still maintains this proposal and continues to fight upon Polish soil, "no free government can either acknowledge or deal with the Soviet oligarchy." Lloyd George and Giolitti know well that Russia would in any case have attacked Poland in pursuance of her intention to Bolshevize Europe and that the Polish advance was no more than a welcome pretext. None the less the onus for the whole situation rests upon the peace conference, which drew the Polish frontier with its eyes shut and utterly without regard either to Polish rights or to the necessities of the situation. The Polish delegates were not even allowed a real hearing by the three or four potentates who imagined themselves as dictators of all human destinies.

While on the subject of Poland let us take three news items that appeared in our papers on Tuesday, August 24th. The first is to the effect that German workmen at Danzig have established Soviets and have seized the piers in order to prevent the landing of stores for Poland. Let it be remembered that Danzig is a Polish port and the only Polish port that exists, although it was "internationalized" by the peace conference for reasons that have not been divulged, there being no reasons to divulge. The next news item is to the effect that Sir Reginald T. Tower, high commissioner of the league of nations at Danzig, has refused to allow the unloading of an American ship with supplies for the Poles, not because he is in any way opposed to the Poles, but because there would be resulting disturbances which he has not troops enough to quell. The third item is to the effect that Lloyd George and Giolitti are concerting measures by which Poland may be allowed the use of the port of Danzig—her own port—according to the orders of the Versailles conference. Poland, it will be remembered, laid claim to Danzig and also to the Prussian territory south of Danzig, as parts of her ancient domain. The conference decided that Danzig should be internationalized and that the Poles should be allowed access to it by means of a corridor through the Prussian territory that they claimed. This Polish corridor, a few miles wide, was to be the sole northern barrier between Russia and Germany. Now it seems that Danzig is practically in the hands of the Reds, as evidenced by the three confirmatory bulletins from London, Lucerne, and Paris. Sir Reginald Tower, we are told, has undoubtedly acted in contravention of the treaty in forbidding the unloading of the American ship, but his action is held to be justified in view of the forces opposed to him. Incidentally we may notice that it is German workmen who formed the Soviet at Danzig in order to prevent help reaching the Poles. We may also notice the bulletin from Coblenz to the effect that Red demonstrations and the formation of two or three Soviets occurred at various points in Germany.

The newspapers of August 24th, from which citations have already been made, were unusually rich in dispatches significant of the coming storm. The anti-Red forces of the Ukraine under General Wrangel have naturally been heartened by the Polish success before Warsaw. It will be remembered that the Ukraine was a part of ancient Poland, and while the Poles make no claim to its present possession, they are resolved that it shall maintain its independence of the Russian Reds. Soviet bulletins draw attention to the energies of Wrangel in the Ukraine and speak of them as an increasing danger. Now Russia is just as eager to conquer the Ukraine as she is to conquer Poland, and while she gave her verbal acquiescence to the independence of the Ukrainians just as she did to that of the Poles, she has insistently interfered with the Ukrainian government and has shown in every way her determination to control it. Wrangel seems to be a different type of man from Denikin and Kolchak and free from the personal ambitions that were supposed to govern his predecessors. The war in the East is now nearly as extensive as it was four years ago. It extends from the Baltic to Lemberg and then eastward through the Ukraine. We shall never reach an understanding of the situation on this front by a discussion of the pros and cons of the quarrel between the Russians, the Poles, and the Ukrainians or by an effort to determine who was the aggressor in any particular movement. We can understand the course of events only by a realization of the main intent of Russian policy to Bolshevize Europe and to sweep away whatever stands in the road to that end. Poland must be destroyed because Poland holds the gate to the west. The Ukraine must be destroyed because the Ukraine holds the gate to the south. To represent Soviet Russia as an innocent citizen assailed by thieves is mere vicious nonsense. Bolshevism can not exist without advances and conquests, and this should have been evident enough even to a peace conference. If the conference had actually restored Poland instead of hypocritically pretending to do so, if this had been done quickly while the Allied armies were in being and ready to sustain an equitable decision, there would probably now be no fighting on the eastern front. But the spectacle of an impotent and hamstrung Poland wedged in between Russia and Germany, with no water-front of her own and with her frontiers so drawn as to be at their weakest was naturally a temptation to which Russia has succumbed and to which Germany will succumb. Russia and Germany together could hardly have done anything more wholly to their own advantage.

But the present war is much more extensive than the Russian frontier. A bulletin from Constantinople dated August 23d tells us that the British lines of communication have been cut between Bagdad and Mosul and between Bagdad and the Persian Gulf and that the British garrisons are hard pressed and in need of reinforcements. This represents a line some five hundred miles in length running nearly north and south and through what was formerly Turkish territory. It is in order to maintain their hold upon the route to India that the British are in occupation of this territory. Once more we find ourselves faced by the same causes that produced the great war. Turkey was persuaded into her alliance with Germany in order to insure to Germany the possession of this line. It is practically the line of the Bagdad Railway.

The Arabs who are fighting the British are actuated by two motives. In the first place they have been deprived of their independence and of the custody of their sacred cities. In the second place they are animated by the Mohammedan religious zeal that is making itself felt throughout the whole Mohammedan world. To these may be added the incitements of the Bolsheviks, who are quick to pour oil upon the flames wherever the flames are to be found. Now it may be said at once that the Arabs have very considerable cause for their discontent. They have been independent for ages, ever since the days of the crusades. They gave substantial aid to the cause of the Allies during the war, only to find when the war is over that their territory has been parceled out between France, Great Britain, and Italy under mandates from the league of nations. Now the league of nations had no more right to issue mandates for the government of Mesopotamia than it would have to issue mandates for the government of Holland. It had no right to assume any sort of authority over this territory. It belongs indisputably to the Arabs, who now find broad black lines of delimitation drawn across the map with a notification that henceforth they become wards of nations with whom they have no affiliations either racial or religious. Perhaps this is no large matter to a world that seems to be contemptuous of the simplest laws of territorial honesty, but it is decidedly a large matter to the Arabs themselves, who are now making war upon the mandatories under the quite reasonable conviction that the league of nations is a reincarnation of the Forty Thieves.

Naturally the Russian Reds have been quick to seize upon a situation thus fashioned to their hand. The Third International has summoned a conference to meet at Baku and has issued a manifesto to the peoples of Asia. It is a formidable document and well calculated to find its way to the Asiatic heart. It is addressed directly to the people of Armenia, Turkey, Persia, and Mesopotamia. A single paragraph, as follows, will give a taste of its quality: "Peasants and workers of Persia: The Teheran government of the Kadars and its retinue of provincial Khans have plundered and exploited you through many centuries. The land which, according to the laws of the Sheriat, was your common property has been taken possession of more and more by the lackeys of the Teheran government, they trade it away at their pleasure, they lay what taxes please them upon you, and when, through their mismanagement, they got the country into such a condition that they were unable to squeeze enough juice out of it themselves, they sold Persia last year to English capitalists for £2,000,000, so that the latter will organize an army in Persia that will oppress you still more than formerly, and so the latter can collect taxes for the Khans and the Teheran government. They have sold the naphtha sources in South Persia and thus helped plunder the country." Other sections of this manifesto are addressed directly to the peoples of Armenia, Turkey, and Mesopotamia. One of the results of this agitation is the present fighting to the north and south of Bagdad, where the British have about 80,000 troops, a number quite insufficient to the task in hand. It will be seen, therefore, that nearly the whole of the old eastern front, from the Baltic Sea in the north to the Persian Gulf in the south, is in flames, and with consequences likely to be so momentous that no one can foresee the end. To this area of disturbance we may add Egypt and India. The two great insurrectionary factors of today are Bolshevism and Mohammedanism. They lie at the root of the world's unrest, and to them we must have recourse for an understanding of all the great events that are now current as well as for the basis of such precautions as we may care to indulge in. They can not, in any case, be very cheerful.

SIDNEY CORYN..

SAN FRANCISCO, August 25, 1920.

Some interesting figures relating to the behavior of structural steel at the high temperature of ordinary fires have been given by the United States Bureau of Standards. Naturally, the strength of steel at high temperatures has a very important bearing upon the stability of a structure which may be subjected to fire. Without any protective covering, steel columns fail after only ten or fifteen minutes of exposure to temperatures such as are reached in ordinary fires. Resistance can be greatly increased by the use of coverings of brick, concrete, plaster, tile, etc., to such an extent that columns so protected are unaffected after several hours' exposure to intense heat. Tests have been made to determine the compression strength of specimens of structural steel when heated in an electric furnace to temperatures corresponding to dull-red heat (1100 deg. F.) and loaded up to 20,000 pounds per square inch. It was found that structural steel loaded to 10,000 pounds per square inch fails at about 1075 deg. F., and under a load of 20,000 pounds per square inch failure occurs at about 925 deg. F. For practical considerations, however, the limit of utility may be regarded as reached at temperatures of about 130 deg. F. below those given above.

Irish emigration to Canada has increased 300 per cent. during the last year. Canada, unlike the United States, does not demand a passport from Irish immigrants.

INDIVIDUALITIES.

Dr. A. E. Cameron, Canadian entomologist, is developing a parasite which will effectually control the grasshopper plague. He predicts there will be no possibility of a plague after 1921.

Mrs. Arthur Meighan, wife of the new Canadian premier, will take her position as one of the first women of the province to the north with the distinction of being known throughout Canada as one of the most beautiful women in the length and breadth of the land.

The Arnold family tree, of which Matthew Arnold and Mrs. Humphry Ward were only two of the better-known branches, has put forth a new literary off-shoot in the person of Aldous Huxley. Mr. Huxley is a nephew of Mrs. Ward and a grand-nephew of Arnold. He has just brought out in America a volume of short stories entitled "Limbo."

Mrs. Daniel F. Sullivan of Chicago, who since the death of her son five years ago has devoted her whole time to the care of orphan children, has announced her intention to locate in California, where she considers climatic conditions more favorable for the tots. She has taken care of 142 children, caring for them until they can be placed in suitable permanent homes, and some of them she cared for more than two years.

When the interviewer, accompanied by a photographer, called at the home of Aaron S. Watkins in Germantown, Ohio, the Prohibition party candidate for President was engaged in the domestic duties of the family wash day. Professor Watkins holds the chair of literature in a military college, and salaries of educators are not keeping pace with the higher costs of laundry establishments. He has lived all of his life in his native state, born at Rushsylvania November 29, 1863, was admitted to the practice of law in 1889, and was ordained a Methodist minister in 1895. He received his LL. D. degree from Taylor University in 1902. He was Prohibition candidate for Vice-President in 1903 and again in 1912, and was the party candidate for governor of Ohio in 1905.

Mrs. Sally James Farnham since the age of twenty has become one of the greatest American sculptors, although before that age she had never modeled even a ball or cube and never in her life has she taken a lesson in her chosen art. Mrs. Farnham declares that suddenly she became as busy as that busiest man in the world—the paper-hanging gentleman with one arm and the hives. She marched straight into fame and fortune without any detours or any serious mishaps. The first "job" of this extraordinary sculptress was her third piece of work and was planned in a hospital, when her friends were still laughing at her. It is a large fountain which stands on Captain Emerson's lawn in Baltimore. When the competition was announced for which the winner was to receive the commission Mrs. Farnham simply sketched the fountain, all the details of which she had already conceived. She won against forty contestants, the majority of them sculptors of proved talent and ability. The first money she ever earned was the check received for this fountain—$5000—an enviable debut.

It is a peculiar coincidence that in both private and public life the career of Franklin D. Roosevelt follows closely that of his distinguished kinsman, the late Theodore Roosevelt. Educationally they were similarly fitted, with preparatory work at Groton School, then to Harvard, from which Franklin D. Roosevelt was graduated in 1904. Politically, too, there is an analogy, for both began their public careers in the halls of the state legislature, both became Assistant Secretary of the Navy, and both became nominees of their party for Vice-President. Mr. Roosevelt was born in Hyde Park, Dutchess County, on January 30, 1882, the son of James and Sarah Delano Roosevelt. The family is of Dutch origin, having come to this country from Holland in 1648 and moved to Hyde Park about a hundred years ago. James Roosevelt was a fourth cousin of Colonel Theodore Roosevelt. After his graduation from Harvard Roosevelt entered the law school at Columbia University, and after his admission to the bar in 1907 he became managing clerk for the law firm of Carter, Ledyard & Milburn in New York. Three years later he became a member of the firm of Marvin, Hooker & Roosevelt, general practitioners, with which firm he still retains his connection.

The oldest, most effective, and most persistent reformer in the United States is the Rev. Dr. Wilbur F. Crafts. Twenty-five years ago Dr. Crafts organized the International Reform Bureau at Washington, D. C. Since that time he has been taking in all sorts of reforming—both plain and fancy—and incessantly hammering away year after year until the opposition became weary or disgusted and Congress came across with the desired laws. Dr. Crafts is seventy, but doesn't look it by twenty years, and evidently doesn't feel it by forty years. He has recently mapped out a national and international programme of reformation that a risky young chap of twenty-one would look upon as a lifetime job. His headquarters are located in the historic building on Pennsylvania Avenue which was occupied by the Supreme Court of the United States after the burning of the Capitol by the British in 1814. This building is only a matter of three minutes' walk from the National Capitol, making it quite convenient for the doctor to present his daily desire to the senators and representatives, which he never fails to do. Dr. Crafts was born in Maine, but went to Boston and Connecticut to be educated in the ministry. In the early days of his preaching he teamed with such illustrious parsons as Henry Ward Beecher and T. DeWitt Talmage in New York and Brooklyn.

Thomas Hardy was born in a little village in Dorsetshire—in the countryside that has been his lifelong home and the scene of most of his novels—June 2, 1840. Educated as an architect, he went to London when he became of age, there practicing his profession in a small way and becoming known for writings on architecture and art. It was at the age of thirty that he wrote his first novel, "Desperate Remedies." At the urgency of his wife, a charming young country girl, he then abandoned architecture entirely to go in for writing.

Dr. Esther Lovejoy of Portland, Oregon, is president of the Medical Women's National Association. Dr. Lovejoy has had an unique speaking record, for her work has touched on a number of subjects, including those of Portland's first milk ordinance and systematic medical inspection of school children, while she was head of the Portland board of health. During the war she was sent to France by the Medical Women's National Association to make a survey of the work of helping the women and children of that country. Later under the Red Cross she made a country-wide speaking tour here.

Father Finn, conductor of Paulist choir of New York City, really secures sensational music effects with his choir of seventy boys and men. He is an unique music genius. Born in Boston, Father Finn became a music composer at the age of fifteen, studied music at the New England Conservatory of Music in Boston, and subsequently went to England to study under the famous choirmasters in London. His exceptional ability to train boys' voices and his magnetic power to bring out in choral singing the full value of each boy's voice have made Father Finn the recipient of many honors. In Paris he received the coveted distinction of being decorated with the insignia of the Order of Palms of the French Academy, the highest musical decoration conferred by that celebrated body. During the choir's visit to the Vatican, His Holiness, the late Pope Pius X, conferred upon Father Finn Magister Cantorum (Master of Singers) in recognition of his efforts to promote ecclesiastical choral singing.

Frank Mann, brother to James R. Mann of congressional fame, is often called "the best farmer in America." Among those granting him this distinction is no less an agricultural authority than Dean Davenport of the University of Illinois. To his close friends the congressman is known as an enthusiastic lover and grower of plants. Hundreds of the shrubs growing on the lawns of his neighbors on Chicago's South Side got their start in the Mann gardens. Frank Mann's agricultural interest, however, is no spare-time proposition. It consists of the full-time, full-fledged business of operating a remarkable farm of five hundred acres at Gilman, Illinois. Bois d'Arc Farm, as his place is known, probably is the most productive agricultural area of its size in the Middle West. Here are regularly produced yields from three to four times as large as the average of the United States. Mr. Mann's average acre yield of corn the last ten years has been more than seventy-five bushels. Of oats the average has been better than eighty bushels, while his wheat has averaged about fifty-four bushels to the acre. A field of oats on Bois d'Arc Farm yielded one hundred and fifteen bushels an acre one year. Mann also has produced ninety-three bushels of corn as the acre average of a field, and sixty-three bushels of wheat.

There are over 10,000,000 motor vehicles in the world and America manufactured more than eight-tenths of them. This country during the past six years has exported over a half-million passenger cars and trucks valued at over a half-billion dollars, and at this writing is supplying practically the demands of the world with automobile apparatus. During the year 1919 we exported nearly $50,000,000 worth of tires alone and almost $40,000,000 worth of automobile parts. In 1919 alone this country exported close to 70,000 passenger cars and 16,000 trucks, the combined value being about $110,000,000. The motor vehicle industry in this country has merely begun to supply foreign markets, manufacturers have just awakened to the fact that foreign countries ought to be considered as so many additional states.

Nowhere in America has there been such a diversity of Indian languages as in California. But these languages are now rapidly disappearing. Several of them are known only by five or six and others by only twenty or thirty living persons, and hardly a year passes without some dialect, or even language, ceasing to exist through the death of the last individual able to speak it. Efforts are being made to record all these languages for the sake of the light they throw on the ancient history of the Pacific Coast.

OLD FAVORITES.

The Inchcape Rock.

No stir in the air, no stir in the sea,—
The ship was as still as she could be;
Her sails from heaven received no motion;
Her keel was steady in the ocean.

Without either sign or sound of their shock,
The waves flowed over the Inchcape rock;
So little they rose, so little they fell,
They did not move the Inchcape bell.

The holy Abbot of Aberbrothock
Had placed that bell on the Inchcape rock;
On a buoy in the storm it floated and swung
And over the waves its warning rung.

When the rock was hid by the surges' swell,
The mariners heard the warning bell;
And then they knew the perilous rock,
And blessed the Abbot of Aberbrothock.

The sun in heaven was shining gay,—
All things were joyful on that day;
The sea-birds screamed as they wheeled around,
And there was joyance in their sound.

The buoy of the Inchcape bell was seen,
A darker speck on the ocean green;
Sir Ralph, the rover, walked his deck,
And he fixed his eye on the darker speck.

He felt the cheering power of spring,—
It made him whistle, it made him sing;
His heart was mirthful to excess;
But the rover's mirth was wickedness.

His eye was on the bell and float:
Quoth he, "My men, put out the boat;
And row me to the Inchcape rock,
And I'll plague the priest of Aberbrothock."

The boat is lowered, the boatmen row,
And to the Inchcape rock they go;
Sir Ralph bent over from the boat,
And cut the warning bell from the float.

Down sank the bell with a gurgling sound;
The bubbles rose, and burst around.
Quoth Sir Ralph, "The next who comes to the rock
Will not bless the Abbot of Aberbrothock."

Sir Ralph, the rover, sailed away,—
He scoured the seas for many a day;
And now, grown rich with plundered store,
He steers his course to Scotland's shore.

So thick a haze o'erspreads the sky,
They can not see the sun on high;
The wind bath blown a gale all day;
At evening it hath died away.

On the deck the rover takes his stand;
So dark it is they see no land.
Quoth Sir Ralph, "It will be lighter soon,
For there is the dawn of the rising moon."

"Canst hear," said one, "the breakers roar?
For yonder, methinks, should be the shore.
Now where we are I can not tell,
But I wish we could hear the Inchcape bell."

They hear no sound; the swell is strong;
Though the wind bath fallen, they drift along;
Till the vessel strikes with a shivering shock,—
O Christ! it is the Inchcape rock!

Sir Ralph, the rover, tore his hair,
He cursed himself in his despair.
The waves rush in on every side;
The ship is sinking beneath the tide.

But ever in his dying fear
One dreadful sound he seemed to hear,—
A sound as if with the Inchcape bell
The Devil below was ringing his knell.

Phyllida and Corydon.

In the merry month of May,
In a morn by break of day,
With a troop of damsels playing Forth I rode, forsooth, a-Maying,
When anon by a woodside,
Where as May was in his pride,
I espied, all alone,
Phyllida and Corydon.

Much ado there was, God wot!
He would love and she would not;
She said, "Never man was true;"
He says, "None was false to you."
He said he had loved her long;
She says, "Love should have no wrong."

Corydon would kiss her then;
She said, "Maids must kiss no men
Till they do for good and all."
Then she made the shepherd call
All the heavens to witness, Truth
Never loved a truer youth.

Thus, with many a pretty oath,
Yea and nay, and faith and troth,—
Such as silly shepherds use
When they will not love abuse,—
Love, which had been long deluded,
Was with kisses sweet concluded;
And Phyllida, with garlands gay,
Was made the lady of the May.

Millions of fish are eaten monthly by the cormorant flocks on the Chincha Island near Peru. The cormorants build their nests close together; from 15,000 to 20,000 are frequently found within an area of 5500 square yards.

The process of crushing the seeds of various plants for the purpose of extracting the oils has been known and employed in Japan for centuries.

JAPAN REAL AND IMAGINARY.

Mr. Sydney Greenbie Gives a Lively Account of His Observations in the Country.

Mr. Sydney Greenbie makes no apologies for writing about Japan. Others have written about Japan, perhaps too many others, but nations change rapidly, and the Japan of today is very different from the Japan of 1914. It was after a long journey to Australia, New Zealand, and China that Mr. Greenbie found himself in Japan, and there he remained for nearly two years. Two years, it may be said, is not enough to reach an understanding of a nation, but then so much depends upon the observer, and Mr. Greenbie is an observer of an exceptional kind. He knows what to look for and how to look for it.

Mr. Greenbie has a high opinion of the Japanese woman. She is not merely the female of the male. She is sui generis. The Japanese man has been made effeminate by the attentions of the woman. He occupies the same place in his society as does our woman in ours:

Foreigners seldom get a chance to look into the home life of the Japanese simply because in the majority of cases there is no such thing. Even were you to speak the language fluently, what would most women talk about? They are not trained for social lives, and the reason is as much that they are too bashful as that the Japanese is wilfully reserved. I have been in the homes of a few well-to-do Japanese, and in each case the women would be introduced, but would retire soon after. The homes are then quiet. Among the educated and the converted, the woman does come forward a little, but generally finds more pleasure in serving delicacies than entering the conversation.

This is due to the absence of natural selection in the matter of mating. Were a young man free to choose, he would decide upon one who would not only be wife and mother, but also companion. As it is, only rarely are the dull and stupid eliminated. The parents are more concerned about having meek and obedient daughters-in-law whom they can manage than that their sons should have pleasant companions.

The Japanese craftsmen are good, but the delays they impose are intolerable. Nothing is ever done at once. The simplest task is deferred, and delays are chronic:

One's life in the Orient is one continuous process of hunting down such details as in the ordinary world seem to look after themselves. And the most amazing feature of it all is the bland indifference of the native to your discomfort. If a thing doesn't suit you, even though you ordered it—you needn't take it. Japanese dealers will let you go away without making a purchase rather than effect the simple readjustment to your needs. I had ordered a flat-top table desk with green-felt cover, but found the felt had not been tucked in properly. The man had stained it to suit my special requirements, yet he preferred to take it back rather than finish it off to suit me. "Shikata ga nai!" Oh, the sound of that agglutinated negative always accompanied by a shrug! "It can't be helped!" "Way of doing is not!" "Resource or alternative is not!" And indeed there is not—not that nor anything else. Alternative? Plead and see yourself scorned without mercy. Threat? Only to know that the junsu, or policeman, would put you through the third degree and then leave you as little satisfied as before. You can not punch them, you can not warn them, you can not "do" them. "Shikata ga nai!" Fate never rewarded Western efficiency or American training never to say "I can't" with a more immovable mountain of indifference.

Mr. Greenbie has a good deal to say about the Japanese indifference to the nude, an indifference that is giving way to an imported and detestable prudishness. Western ideas have proved a veritable curse to the Japanese in this respect:

On hot summer days the beach is alive with bathers. Physically the bathers aren't any too robust, but morally it seems that, in spite of all said against them, they move on a much higher plane. It is amazing with what simplicity and indifference bathers changed from bathing suit to kimono without the use of pavilions. Women appeared quite naked, and dressed in the midst of crowds of both sexes, yet no one but ourselves seemed to pay any attention to it. I believe the time will come when the Japanese will hate the foreigners most bitterly and most justly for their interference in this phase of their life. For nothing but the poison of prudishness has come to take the place of their former indifference to the nude. It is the custom of missionary critics of Japanese morality to forget the immorality they left behind. No one who knows the Japan of yesterday and today will say that the people have been bettered in any way by the introduction of Western morality. It must not be forgotten that in ancient times, as now, here as everywhere, adultery has been looked upon as a crime.

Japan is a country of contrasts, of ancient and modern side by side, of filth and cleanliness, of education and superstition. The smells in the street are indescribably evil, but the stock exchange reminds one of New York or London:

The state of flux in which modern Japan now moves leaves all attempts at studying the problem in the realm of speculation. Industrially, Osaka is the heart of Japan. Its factories cloud the sky with smoke and its stock exchange controls the pulse of the Orient. An exchange is quite a different proposition in Japan from what it is in America. The visitors' "gallery" is more open to the public than a zoo, and one has some difficulty discovering which is hull and which head. But for the policeman I might have wandered into the lions' section. Two officers stood at the wicket and barred my way. So I turned back into the crowd from which I had come, stumbling over the unexpected steps in the inclined floor. The crowd was thick. No seats about, the men stood close together—now more interested in the foreigner than the market. Well they might be. But when the momentary interest vanished they were as forgetful of foreigners as the spirit of speculation is native to them. Between them and the gamblers was only the slope in the floor. That afternoon things were tame. The "animals" had eaten their fill during the wild rampageous days before the rice riots, and though one might think the lean period would intensify their hunger, the whip of riot had subdued them somewhat. The "auctioneer" from his pulpit suddenly advanced his offering, whereupon the speculators gathered round him like the lions before

Daniel, but his intrepid self-composure kept them at bay. They screamed in his face and shook their fingers at him; a moment more and he must certainly perish. But suddenly the irate mob disintegrates, and the unfed pack falls apart indifferently. The door to the street is open and the messengers course in and out, while upon the narrow gallery running round the chamber others chalk the changes upon the boards. Immediately before the pit is another device, peculiarly Japanese, which keeps the stranger guessing. The boys twirl the strips of metal as though a guessing contest were on, and the excited brokers watch them with intense interest.

The Japanese woman is quite conscious of the different status enjoyed by women of the white world. When the author went to a Japanese hotel in Tokyo a girl took his suitcases. He relieved her of the undue burden and she remarked, "Foreigners are very kind-hearted":

I was taken to the top story and given a corner room, neat, costly-looking, modern, but Japanese in every detail. And here it struck me that this is the secret of all Westernization of the Orient. Though it was an extremely up-to-date building, still in all essentials it was as inconvenient as one in the olden days. When I asked for a bath I was led down the three sets of stairs to the cellar where were the communal bath and lavatories. Imagine having to go three stories to wash yourself and washing in common with all the other strangers in the hotel. It struck me that socially the Japanese hotel is a negative affair. Washing, gargling, and clearing of throats are done in common, but eating and every other function by us regarded as social is done in private. Of course, eating should not be a social affair, either, for that matter, but the contrast is interesting. When I was ushered into the bath by the maid she called aloud into the room with the pool that a guest had come, and forthwith a tiny little woman came out with a towel in her hand—and not a stitch of clothes about her. Nudity has its attractions when slightly concealed, but when no secrecy obtains it has the opposite effect. She was small, she was brown. But she hadn't even a blush on her face. Why should she? None of the people she cares anything about considers it wrong! I made my way into the bath. Two men were there, but left shortly. I wasn't alone five minutes when in came a dainty damsel with as much on her as I myself had. She was soon followed by another, and the two seemed to support each other in virtue. They entered the pool and huddled in a corner. An old man entered and also stepped right into the water. The male attendant chatted with the ladies, and never a sign of confusion or of things amiss disturbed the atmosphere. It was the first experience of the kind I had had in all my stay in Japan. One is here inclined to agree with the Japanese that they don't need Western moral restrictions because they are naturally moral, though this is not an absolute truth. And the story is told by those whose veracity is not to be doubted that when first the edict went forth that no one was to go into the sea at the beach without a bathing suit on, all obeyed the order, but all took off their suits on the sand after they came out of the water.

The author describes the ascent of Fuji as one of the most impressive experiences that the world can furnish. On the occasion of his own ascent there were some two thousand persons wending their way upward, and the entire mass halted and faced about to greet the rising sun:

The first ascent I made was from Suhashiri. When we reached the peak at 6:30 we were welcomed by the biting wind, strong enough to lift whomsoever ventured away from the lava wall clear off his feet. Very few climbers went anywhere near the crater, and those who did returned rather hurriedly. In double file the soldiers were marched off up the ridge and they disappeared in a cloud. We risked the wind and reached the edge, creeping on our stomachs for a glance over into the crater. A gale from over the gulch pressed down the deep pit and brought back with it a cloud of mist. Heaps of snow lay bedded in the inner cavities where once was seething lava. As the wind made a breach in the cloud it revealed the snowdrifts like sharp, angry teeth. My companion, just a youth, said, with somewhat of awe in his voice, "It felt as though you were looking into something which you had no right to see."

The path of the foreign instructor in Japan is now no more the path of glory. The days when he was the idol of new Japan are gone. Today he is an inconsequential drudge and he is fortunate if his years of patient effort are not rewarded with a medal and dismissal:

I had entered upon my duties as instructor of English in the Kobe Higher Commercial School with all sorts of notions about methods. Nothing in all my life have I unlearned so quickly as those useless schemes. One very worldly schoolmaster, without the shadow of an illusion circling round his bald head, puts the situation exquisitely to his students when they ask him which is right: "English people say it this way; Americans, that; Japanese say it as they like." I was not given a single hint as to how much English the students knew nor what I should teach. And I had to find out. To get them to talk is as difficult as driving an artesian well; you sometimes go a thousand feet through rock and then get no water. They simply will not open their mouths. Yet most of them have had seven and eight years of English study. One of the first peculiarities I noticed was that when looking straight into the eyes of a student, and asking him a question, he will invariably think you are talking to his neighbor and regard him as the guilty person. And behind and around him half a dozen will bob up as though they had been called upon. This most likely comes from the native habit of never looking into a man's eyes when speaking to him.

The emperor's birthday is a solemn occasion throughout Japan. Portraits of the royal family are displayed with appropriate ceremonies. There is nothing shabby or affected about it, says the author. It is done thoroughly and properly and with reverence:

I had once unwittingly led a class in general discussion from one thing to another until, under current events, I contrasted the freedom of movement of the President of the United States with the King of England. It had been reported that returned soldiers on parade broke ranks and shook hands with the king. I then contrasted the easy simplicity of Prince Arthur with the rigid formalism of Prince Nashimoto, both of whom I had seen while stopping at the Nara Hotel one summer. Then I added that formerly, when their emperor passed, they were not allowed to look at him, any one caught so doing being in danger of losing his eyes. Even today no one can be on an open balcony, but must be on the ground when royalty goes by. I made no comment on this. Up spoke one student, "You must not mention our emperor in the same breath with kings and presidents."

With all the world exercising the rights of censorship there is no reason why the Japanese censorship should be singled out for blame. But other governments, says the author, take care that their rules and regulations shall be known, but in Japan the interpretation of the law depends upon whim:

For instance. You are a publisher of a foreign newspaper, You have lived for years in the country, respected and feared. You have tried to understand the ways of the people among whom you have chosen to live. You insist, however, on publishing news when it comes to you.

But, "No," says the censor. "You may surely publish news, but you must take your chances in the matter. It is not unlikely that the news you publish in your newspaper may not be to our advantage, and in consequence it will be suppressed."

"But if that is the case," you plead, "kindly tell us what kind of news we may not publish."

"That we can not do," admits the censor, "for we do not know what news will come in for you to publish." And, indeed, even a censor will admit his ignorance sometimes, and not all can be expected to be prophets.

"Then," you pray, "will you please tell us what of that news we have already published is objectionable. Point out specifically why you have suppressed our issue?"

"That is also impossible," says the censor (or, to be exact, the police official who happens to have been detailed on that job), "because, if we did that, then you might make use of the point in an indirect way and thus expose our desire for secrecy."

"Then what shall I do?" says the editor, despairingly, or turns to his desk with an idea.

Everywhere in Japan there is the discord between the old and the new. It is too early to predict whether old Japan will be vanquished or whether the result will be an entirely different species japonicus:

The strangest thing withal is to what a slight extent Westernization has really affected Japan. Almost all the friends the foreigner makes are people who have spent from ten to fifteen years in the Occident—the early years of their lives. The wife of one was born in America and did not see Japan till she was nearly twenty. She is American in a repressed sort of way. Her voice is American, and some of her facial expressions are. Yet since her coming to the home of her ancestors she has been Japanese entirely. How resigned a reversion to type! Had her birth and rearing in America eradicated her inheritance, no Japanese custom would be able to hinder her. A Chinese woman with such acquired characteristics would in the same position influence at least a limited circle within her new sphere, as did Princess Der Ling after her coming to China from the first nineteen years of her life in Europe. She was a dynamic force in the very midst of one of the most crystallized forms of Orientalism. She even effected changes in the habits of the Empress Dowager.

But not so the Japanese woman. Nor the man, either, for that matter. Though the germ of Westernism takes hold somewhat, still he is through and through Japanese. It is impossible completely to Occidentalize him. True that the white man is as unyielding when it comes to being Orientalized and that in consequence little blame need attach itself to the Japanese. But it is considerably more reactive in the case of the Japanese. He takes on the protective coloring of his environment easily enough. He manifests certain traits peculiar to his new environment, but they disappear almost immediately after his return. I have met a number of Japanese who told me that they intend to carry on their business in American ways or quit Japan again. But soon enough that is forgotten.

Japanese self-control is the result of centuries of subjection to superiors, when the head was called upon to hide the heart. None the less, says the author, a little study will enable one to read the Japanese heart as readily as any other:

In all the "scare" talk about Japan's militarism—essentially true from the bureaucratic angle—one must not lose sight of the basic character of the people. Japanese chauvinists try to impress the world with the word samurai as symbolic of something latent in the Nipponese breast. But it has now come to the point where Japan can no longer withhold the truth that distaste of the army is as prevalent in Japan as elsewhere. The number of young men who have themselves "doctored," starved, and lied to be found ineligible for service is increasing everywhere. That is because bushido, or the way of the soldier, is not as component a part of Japanese nature as they would have us believe.

The relations of the foreigner to the Japanese are peculiar. It is the foreigner who takes the lead in any complaints to the authorities. The native is too timid to do this himself:

The foreigner is more dynamic, more bold, less timid in the presence of authority. This frequently results in discord. The truth of the matter is that the foreigner is not infrequently to blame. Take, for instance, one of the popular handbooks to colloquial Japanese. To read the hazy, hilly remarks this compiler places at the command of the tourist is a sad reflection on the nature and practice of Westerners. Considering that we regard ourselves as superiors it is a sad commentary on our gentility that any one should think we would use the suggested remarks this little volume contains. The editor frankly heads them as "Some disagreeable assertions." Here are a few: "He is a terrible liar." "You idiot." "You're a liar." Here are two not in the above category: "Really, the fleas in this house are remarkable." "This hutter smells horribly." And so on. I must say that there is ample occasion for such remarks, and confess that I have been more than once driven to using some, but in the ears of the erstwhile humble Japanese these must have sounded harsh beyond words, though I dare say he got as much and worse from his own superiors.

The Japanese, says the author, will have to overcome their national self-conceit. But this is a malady that afflicts all nations. But at least we have here an admirable picture of the form that it assumes in Japan.

BANKING AND INVESTMENT NEWS.

San Francisco bank clearings for the week ending August 21, 1920, were $164,800,000; for the corresponding week of last year, $146,700,000; a gain of $18,100,000.

Total resources of the banks included in the Twelfth Federal District increased $1,335,000 during the last week, according to the report issued Saturday by the San Francisco Federal Reserve Bank. The biggest gain shown in the report was in earning assets, the increase there being $2,881,000, while the gold supply on hand advanced $1,831,000.

Gold reserves decreased $1,259,000 in the period covered and hills on hand gained $864,000 over last week.

For the first time in three years the treasury reports show that actual income exceeded expenditure, and another comforting announcement is the fact that the gross public debt has been reduced by $2,332,000,000, which is looked upon by the New York Evening Post as "a considerable achievement." In his statement Secretary Houston said that an analysis of treasury operations for the past fiscal year shows a net current deficit of only $71,179,072.21, taking into account the special deposit of $363,100,619 in June by the War Finance Corporation after redeeming Liberty bonds held by it. There appears as of June 30th an adjusted surplus of ordinary receipts over net ordinary disbursements of $291,221,547 for the fiscal year. According to the Washington Bureau of the New York Journal gregated $6,694,565,388, while expenditures total $6,403,343,841."

In his statement, as published to the press, Secretary Houston says:

"My letter of June 10, 1920, to banks and trust companies, in connection with the offering of treasury certificates of indebtedness dated June 15th, called attention to the fact that the treasury certificates to the amount of nearly one billion dollars would mature on or before July 15th, and stated, first, that the completed operations for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1920, should show little, if any, current deficit; and, secondly, that both gross debt and floating debt would be further greatly reduced by the operations incident to the handling of the treasury certificate maturities from June 15th to July 15th. The results show that the treasury's figures' expectation has been realized.

"On the basis of daily treasury statements, the total ordinary receipt for the fiscal year ended June 30th amounted to $6,694,565,388.88, and current ordinary disbursements amounted to $6,766,444,461.09, leaving a net current deficit of only $71,179,072.21 for the fiscal year 1920, the first full fiscal year after hostilities ceased. After taking into account the special deposit of the War Finance Corporation, resulting from its redemption of United States securities, the net ordinary disbursements for the fiscal year 1920 were $6,403,343,841.21, leaving an adjusted surplus of $291,221,547.67 for the fiscal year.

"The operations incident to the handling of the maturities of treasury certificates from June 15th to July 15th have now been completed and have resulted in further reductions in both the gross debt and the floating debt of the United States. The gross debt on June 30th, on the basis of daily treasury statements, amounted to $24,299,321,467.07, as against $25,484,506,160.05 at the end of the previous fiscal year on June 30, 1919, and $26,596,701,648.01 on August 31, 1919, when the gross debt was at its peak. In other words, the gross debt on June 30, 1920, has been reduced by $2,297,380,180.94 from its peak on August 31, 1919, and by $1,185,184,692.98 from the figure on June 30, 1919. On July 20, 1920, on the basis of daily treasury statements, the gross debt amounted to $24,264,309,321.54, showing a further reduction of about $35,000,000 after taking into account the $201,061,500 face amount of treasury certificates issued under date of July 15th. The floating debt on June 30th amounted to $2,485,552,500, against $3,267,878,500 on June 30, 1919, and $3,938,225,000 on August 31, 1919. On July 20, 1920, the loan and tax certificates outstanding amounted to $2,453,946,500, showing a further reduction of about $31,000,000 as the result of the redemption of loan certificates since the close of the fiscal year 1920 in the amount of some $232,000,000 and the issue of loan and tax certificates dated July 15th in the amount of some $201,000,000.

"Further issues of treasury certificates will be offered as necessary from time to time to provide for the current requirements of the government and to meet maturities of treasury certificates now outstanding. The amounts of these issues will depend in large measure upon the extent of the burden imposed by the Transportation Act of 1920, in connection with the return of the railroad to private control, including particularly the liability on the guaranty, which is as yet unascertainable.

"While, as the result of new issues of treasury certificates in the intervals between the large income and profits-tax installments, there may be temporary increases in both gross debt and floating debt, the treasury expects, though it is impossible to speak positively, that both gross debt and floating debt will, during the first two quarters of the current fiscal year, be reduced below the figures outstanding on June 30, 1920, and that unless additional burdens should be imposed by legislation there will be an important further reduction in the last quarters of the fiscal year."

Secretary Houston's statement that the fiscal year ending with June produced a surplus revenue for the government was no news so far as the simple fact of a surplus is concerned, remarks the New York Evening Post. "That was made plain from the treasury's daily report a month ago." The part of the Secretary's statement which does convey some information, this paper says, "is his figures on the public debt." We are told that—"It was known already that this debt reached its maximum on August 31st last year, when nearly all the subscription to the Victory Loan of May had been paid in, and had not yet been offset by retirement of floating indebtedness. The gross public debt was then $26,596,701,648; on the 20th of the present month it was $24,264,309,321. A reduction of $2,332,000,000 in eleven months is a considerable achievement, but it evidently was not accomplished through the applying of a surplus revenue to redeeming the public debt. Up to the close of last month $1,850,000,000 of the war loans had been redeemed on a sinking-fund basis. This must have been affected largely through use of proceeds either of one set of bonds to redeem another or of the proceeds of treasury short-term certificates.

"Yet the floating debt itself has been reduced: it stood at $3,938,225,000 on August 31, 1919, and at $2,453,946,000 on July 20th this year; which means both that a very large amount (about $1,300,000,000) of such temporary indebtedness outstanding last August has been extinguished with the proceeds of the 1919 war loan, and that further reduction has been made by the closer adjustment to accruing taxes of anticipatory borrowings against such revenue. To what extent the floating debt which is still outstanding can be reduced in the present fiscal year must depend on results with the surplus revenue.

A block of the $25,000,000 bond issue of the New York Central Railroad has been purchased by the Lumbermen's Trust Company and is being offered on the local market in $500 and $1000 denominations priced at 100 to yield 7 per cent. The issue runs ten years, being dated September 1, 1920, and due September 1, 1930.

The road's estimated earnings for 1921 are $80,000,000, as compared with total fixed charges of $48,000,000 for the same period, including the current bond issue. Additional security is furnished by a deposit with trustee of collateral with a market value of $31,425,000.

The money secured from the issue will be used to retire notes and bank loans.

The opportune time to buy high-grade investment bonds is when commodity prices are high, says the Freeman, Smith & Camp Company in a circular letter to their clients. That is the condition today, but there are daily new evidences of a change in process. Market values of staples in many lines are shrinking. When crop values advance land values keep pace. When crop values fall land values depreciate. There is a natural relation. The 50 per cent. mortgage of today approximates a 100 per cent. valuation of a few years ago. Values of high-grade bonds run conversely. A falling market for commodities brings increased demand for high-grade bonds with advance in values.

Taxes for paying municipal bonds run ahead of any mortgage debt, and to effect a clear title when foreclosing a mortgage one must pay up all taxes, street improvement assessments, etc., to protect his loan. Taxes for payment of bond principal and interest attach directly to the land and can not be evaded.

The United States Supreme Court on June 1st rendered its decision establishing for all time that constitutionally the United States is powerless to tax either the principal or the income derived from municipal bonds. This sets at rest all private differences of opinion on this subject.

If the cost of living is raised more than 2 per cent. by the $1,200,000,000 increase in freight charges it will be plain evidence that middlemen and retailers are taking an unfair advantage of the public. An increase of 2 per cent. in average prices would be the maximum cost of the rate advance if there were no change in other forces acting on the price level. But the general tendency of prices is now downward. We have passed the peak of war inflation. It is reasonable to believe, therefore, that prices will fall rather than rise after the new rates are in effect.

The fact is that in the production of most articles of common daily consumption the transport charge is so small that an increase in rates has no appreciable effect in the family budget. In bulky articles like coal, of course, where transportation is a very large part of the process of production and distribution, an increase in freight rates necessarily means higher prices. But even these comparatively large increases in particular commodities may be absorbed as a result of other forces working for lower prices.

The increase in passenger rates, while producing a very much smaller amount of additional revenue than the new freight rates, will strike more directly at the average man's pocketbook. But the new passenger rates will raise travel expenses less than $3 per capita a year, or less than 1 cent a day. Suburban residents, who travel thousands of miles a year for the pleasure of living in the country while working in the city, will pay much more than this average.

The $1,500,000,000 of additional freight and passenger revenue to be paid by the public for railroad service under the new rates will not go into the treasuries of the railroads nor into the pockets of the owners. Practically all of this additional revenue will go directly to the two million railroad workers whose wages have been established on a new level after the most careful consideration of all the facts by a government wage board.

The recent wage award in Chicago gave to the railroad employees an additional $625,000,000 a year or an average of more than $300 to each employee. During the two years of government operation of railroads, because of the increase in the cost of living, the Railroad Administration raised wages by more than $1,000,000,000 a year. The total increase in wages, therefore, since May, 1918, when the Lane Wage Board made its first award, is more than $1,600,000,000 a year, or considerably more than the new freight and passenger rates will produce.

The increases in rates made by the government in 1918, which produced about $900,000,000 additional revenue, were practically all absorbed by the increased prices for fuel and materials consumed in railroad operation. As a very large part of the increased cost of coal and materials purchased by the railroads has been due to the more than 100 per cent. rise in wages paid workers in these other industries, it is plain that the great bulk of the $2,400,000,000 increase in railroad rates in the past three years goes to the wage-earners.

Under the new scale of railroad wages the average annual earnings per employee will be $1900, as compared with $830 at the beginning of the war. This is an increase of 129 per cent. The railroad pay-roll today is on the basis of $3,600,000,000 a year, or $2,000,000,000 more than it would be if the employees were being paid at the pre-war rates.

These plain facts show that the railroad owners do not receive $1,500,000,000 or any of Commerce, while the annual operations of the government showed a surplus of $291,221,547, the more important change, treasury officials said, was the cutting of $1,185,184,602 from the gross public debt during the year. It is explained that—

"The national debt aggregated $24,299,321,467 on June 30th, and $25,484,506,160 a year previously, but in the meantime the obligations of the nation had mounted to their highest point—$26,596,701,608 on August 31st—due to the operations incident to the handling of maturities of treasury certificates of indebtedness. Thus, a reduction of $2,297,380,180 from the peak is shown.

appreciable part of it. For some time to come there is not likely to be any considerable increase in the returns paid to the owners of railroad securities. The effect of the award of the Commerce Commission is to enable the railroads to pay fair wages to their employees and to continue to make the modest return to their security owners that they did before the war. Larger returns to the owners will only be possible as a result of intensive work on the part of the managements to increase efficiency.

The workers have fared very much better than the owners, because their wages have been raised to make up for the decreased purchasing power of the dollar, while there has been no corresponding increase in the pay for capital.—Frank H. Fayant, assistant to the chairman, Association of Railway Executives.

The Guardian Savings and Trust Company of Cleveland Ohio, placed in its window an advertisement of "The California Ranching Company," which according to the announcement, was starting a cat ranch in California with 100,000 cats. Next door it was to start a rat ranch with 1,000,000 rats. The rats, as they multiplied, were to be fed to the cats; the cats were to be skinned and their carcasses fed to the rats.

"We feed the rats to the cats, and the cats to the rats, and get the skins for nothing. Shares are selling at 5 cents each, but the price will go up soon. Invest while opportunity knocks at your door."

Crowds gathered outside the window; many went in to ask for a prospectus or further information regarding the proposition; they wanted to know where they could buy the stock. The advertisement became a veritable nuisance to the bank. And this despite the fact that underneath it, in large letters, was the warning that it was a foolish fake, "although no more foolish than many 'wildcat' schemes being promoted today," and the admonition: "Investigate before investing. Don't hand your money over to any unknown glib-tongued salesman."

Many read little beyond the first line—"Glorious Opportunity to Get Rich Quick"—and were ready to bite and become "suckers."

Lists of the names of these "suckers" are traded and sold among the parasitical fraternity of get-rich-quick promoters. If for any reason you have gotten on one of these lists you will likely before long begin to receive tempting literature from others. But if you are a good paying "sucker" you will be placed on a special list of the promoter who discovered you, and he will not part with your name until he thinks he has gotten all the money he can out of you. Then he will sell your name as an "easy sucker" to one of his brother pirates, who is ready to pay more for the names of once-sold "suckers" than for new ones, for he knows that those in the habit of hitting will be easier to laud again with new bait.

When the notorious Burr Brothers were put out of the business by the postoffice authorities several years ago William M. Sheridan rushed on from Chicago and is believed to have stolen their valuable "sucker list." He ran on in their footsteps for many years, until recently he was arrested in Kentucky for using the mails to defraud.

No law can protect "suckers" from their own foolishness. The money of those who would not heed the warning attached to the announcement of this classical cat and rat ranch fake, as it appeared in the bank window, can not be safeguarded by law. Education is all that will save them; and usually it has to be education by experience. The law does not step in until the fake is proven. Then it is too late to save the "suckers'" money.

Investigation is the best safeguard. Yet more money is put into worthless promotions, solely upon the word of the promoter himself or his agents, and is lost, than goes into any other channel with as little investigation. The man who would not spend ten thousand dollars in the extension of his own business without long and careful investigation of the possibilities of earning a good return upon it and getting his money back will risk all his savings in an alluring stock promotion without even asking whether the proposition exists outside of the promoter's fertile brain, and without any investigation of its chances of success.

That this is true is not only shown by the experience of the Cleveland bank, but also by the fact that there has grown up in recent years a school of promotion houses that sell stocks on what is known as the "one-call" system. The salesmen of these houses, after memorizing the prepared sales argument, call upon the prospective client. They first ascertain that he has some money which he could "invest" if he cared to. Then they make him promise that he will decide definitely at the close of that interview whether or not he will "invest" in their proposition. If he will not agree to this, the salesman will go no farther. In no event must he go back to call upon the man the second time. In other words, the prospective client is given no chance to investigate the proposition. Several of these houses have sprung up in the past few years and have had a remarkable mushroom growth.—Century Magazine.

E. H. Rollins & Sons and Cyrus Peirce & Co. are participating in an offer of $3,500,000 Great Western Power Company of California general mortgage convertible 8 per cent. gold bonds in denominations of $100, $500, and $1000; price, 100 and interest, yielding from 10.31 to 8.33 per cent., according to date called by lot. Due August 1, 1930. These gold bonds are exempt from personal property tax in California and the company agrees to pay interest without deduction for any normal Federal income tax up to 4 per cent. which it may lawfully pay at the source. Under the present law the company will pay the 2 per cent. tax deductible at the source.

The company covenants that, beginning August 1, 1922, it will pay to the trustee annually, as and for a sinking fund, a sum of money to be used in retiring bonds by lot at 105 and accrued interest, which sum shall be sufficient, when paid annually during the remaining life of the bonds, including the year 1930, to retire the entire issue at a premium of 5 per cent. This sum will amount to $408,333 plus accrued interest on August 1, 1922, if $3,500,000 bonds are outstanding on that date.

These bonds are to be later secured by a pledge of an equal amount in par value of a new Series "B" thirty-year 7 per cent. bonds when issued under the company's existing first and refunding mortgage, dated March 1, 1919, which bonds will rank equally with the $6,000,000 of 6 per cent. Series "A" bonds now outstanding. The outstanding bonds under this mortgage have been certified as a legal investment for California savings banks, and application will be made to certify the new 7 per cent. series as issued. Until such bonds have been issued and pledged as security for this issue no further first and refunding bonds may be issued.

When called as a whole, which may be done only after completion of the pledge of 7 per cent. bond collateral, or by lot, the holders of this issue will have the option of either being paid in cash at 105 and accrued interest, or accepting pledged 7 per cent. bonds at par, accrued interest and a cash premium of 5 per cent. When bonds of the new series of first and refunding 7 per cent. bonds equal in par value to the total amount of general mortgage convertible 8 per cent. bonds shall have been pledged with toe trustee, the holders of the latter may at any time convert their bonds at 102½ and accrued interest into pledged 7 per cent. bonds at par and accrued interest, the company paying the premium of 2½ per cent. in cash.

E. H. Rollins & Sons recommend these bonds as an exceptional short-term investment convertible on attractive terms into long-term 7 per cent. underlying bonds.

An advance in freight and passenger rates was inevitable, because of the $600,000,000 increased wage award by the United States Railroad Labor Board and the sharp rise in the price of rails, cars, locomotives, and various supplies used by the railroads (says the Wells Fargo Nevada National Bank in the Business Outlook for August). The substantial amount of increase granted, approximating $1,500,000,000, has been a source of great satisfaction to business men generally, for it means that the roads are going to collect enough from the public to put them in a strong position able to meet the advances in wages and materials and so to render adequate service. It also emphasizes the changes that have taken place since the imperative demands of the world war showed the American people how important it was for them to have a railroad system of the highest efficiency. The provisions of the new transportation act make it necessary for the Interstate Commerce Commission to give the railroads earnings sufficient to enable them to earn 5½ or 6 per cent. on their property investment. In this way their future income is reasonably assured and they will be protected from many of the hardships which they suffered in the past.

The higher freight schedules will increase living costs somewhat, but the $1,500,000,000 additional allowed on freight and passenger traffic taken together will average less than $15 annually per capita of our population. This increase is small, indeed, compared with other factors in the price level, and especially with the forces now tending to reduce the cost of living. It has been estimated that $1 or $1.50 will be added to the price of pig-iron to cover the higher freight charge. On the other hand the increased rates will not add more than 5 cents to the price of a pair of shoes and only a few cents to the cost of a suit of clothes. It may take several months to ascertain just what the actual effect of the new schedules upon the country's industry will be, or to what extent, if any, the efficiency of the whole railroad system will be increased as a consequence of the higher wage awards and new machinery and equipment with which the railroads will now be able to supply themselves. Heavy orders for new cars, locomotives, and various supplies have been given out and efforts will be made to obtain deliveries as soon as possible. The roads are in an extremely poor physical condition and prompt measures must be taken to provide the increased facilities which the public demands. For many kinds of foodstuffs and essential merchandise the price has been made substantially higher through transportation congestion due to inferior shipping facilities. Improved railroad facilities will therefore contribute much to reduce credit strain.

Much has been written in these columns of late regarding the big Carhou hydro-electric development in Plumas County of the Great Western Power Company of California.

To the layman, to say that the first unit of this new plant will be finished at the beginning of next year and will develop 44,000 kilowatts, or 58,000 horsepower, does not mean much. To reduce the development of this big job to men, food, and equipment makes the size of the project understandable to every man, woman, and child; therefore the following figures, which have just been compiled by the Great Western Power Company, will be of interest to every one.

The men and materials which will be required before the Carhou development is completed reach the following tremendous proportions: A force of 1500 men daily; 3,000,000 meals; twenty-seven miles of private railway tracks; 4000 cars of material and equipment requiring thirty-four miles of trackage; 50,000 cubic yards of concrete; 60,000 barrels of cement, or a train of 340 cars of cement; 25,000 cubic yards of sand, or a train of 1150 cars of sand; 45,000 cubic yards of rock, or a train of 2250 cars of rock; a sawmill capable of 40,000 B. M. per day, which will turn out 13,000,000 B. M. before the close of job; 10,000,000 pounds of steel used in reinforcement, structural steel, penstocks, lines, etc.

The Cities Service Company continued to show material progress in earnings for July and the seven months ending July 31st. Gross earnings of the company for July were $2,117,919.87, an increase of $534,197.82 over July, 1919. After providing for all expenses and interest, net earnings for July were $1,900,084.08, an increase of $550,146.77, with a balance available for reserves, dividends on the common stock and surplus, for the month of $1,510,269.13, a gain of $513,510.82. For the seven months ending July 31, 1920, gross earnings were $14,861,219.39, an increase of $2,514,678.85 over the corresponding period of 1919. After providing for all expenses and interest charges, net earnings were $13,325,665.26, a gain of $2,514,195.06, with a balance available for reserves, dividends on the common stock, and surplus for the seven months of 1920 of $10,630,611.41, compared with $8,396,915.70, or an increase of $2,233,695.71, showing that this balance for the seven months was at an annual rate of approximately $45 a share on the common stock.

For the twelve months ending July 31, 1920, gross earnings were $22,492,229.62, a gain of $1,131,124.92 over the preceding twelve months, with net earnings of $21,800,466.80, an increase of $1,129,531.65, while the balance for the twelve months, available for reserves, dividends on the common stock, and surplus, was $15,369,285.83, compared with $15,201,856.79 for the twelve months ending July 31, 1919. For the twelve months ending July 31, 1920, $40.94 a share was earned on the common stock outstanding in the hands of the public, while requirements for preferred dividends for the period were earned 4.42 times.

Announcement was made recently by the traffic department of the Southern Pacific Company that its Sunset Gulf Route, by which a great portion of California products move to New York via the ports of New Orleans and Galveston, is now open for business in both directions and no permits are any longer necessary.

Sanity in Sex.

Mr. William J. Fielding has courageously handled a delicate subject, and moreover he has done it delicately, which is more than can be said of a good many writers. The problem is an old one, but it has been renovated, so to speak, by the war. Moral standards have either broken down or they are being so revised as to be unrecognizable. The need for the restraint of license and the results of license is more imperative than ever.

The situation is well shown by the military statistics with regard to a certain disease. The figures show Germany to be at the top of the tree with 19.8 per 1000 soldiers disabled in 1906, and the United States at the bottom of the tree with 196.99 per 1000 soldiers disabled in 1909. There has been an improvement since that time, the number per thousand thus disabled having been reduced in 1918 to 99.65. It may be noted with satisfaction and as much to the credit of the army that men in uniform contracting the disease were much less numerous than men in civilian life. Apparently one might do much worse from the moral point of view than "raise his boy to be a soldier."

Without entering on an extended review of a book that ought to be widely read it may be said that Mr. Fielding has presented us with the real facts in a form that is far from being distasteful and that never violates the boundaries of good taste.

SANITY IN SEX. By William J. Fielding. New York: Dodd, Mead & Co.

In Kut and Captivity.

This volume of nearly five hundred pages is devoted to the achievements of the Sixth Indian Division, which formed part of the British force intended for the capture of Bagdad. The author, Major E. W. C. Sandes, D. S. O., M. C., R. E., disclaims any intention to write a history of the war in Asia, and no doubt we shall have other and more detailed accounts. But this is the best story that has yet been given to us. It is divided into three parts, the first dealing with the successful advance from the Persian Gulf to Kut-el-

Amarah, the second with the siege of Kut, and the third with the period of captivity. These various epochs are described with almost the precision of a daily diary and in such a way that students of the campaign can follow its vicissitudes with ease, an end to which the many maps very largely conduce.

Some other accounts have represented the treatment of the British prisoners by the Turks as by no means intolerable. Perhaps this was true in some cases, but Major Sandes and his companions seem to have had substantial cause for complaint. They were subjected to innumerable brutalities and indignities during their imprisonment at Yozgad. They made several efforts to escape, but they were frustrated, and it was not until the collapse of Germany was obvious that the oppressive regulations of captivity were relaxed. The prisoners were allowed to go where they wished and the parcels of which they had been deprived were showered upon them. Numerous and useful appendices complete a record that is in every way satisfactory.

IN KUT AND CAPTIVITY WITH THE SIXTH INDIAN DIVISION. By Major E. W. C. Sandes, D. S. O., M. C., R. E. New York: E. P. Dutton & Co.; $10.

European Literature.

This history of European literature begins at the beginning and takes us to the year 1637, the year of the foundation of the French Academy and of Richelieu's enrollment of Corneille. The author tells us that it is intended to be the first of three volumes telling the story of European literature from the twelfth century to the twentieth, but he does not tell us when we may expect the other volumes. But the present one is complete in itself.

It must suffice to state the topics dealt with by the author in his ten chapters. These are "Story-Matters and Story-Writers," "The Age of Dante," "The Fourteenth Century," "1374-1492," "The Transit Through 1492," "Europe at School," "Europe at Large," "The Maturity of Romance," "The Age of Milton," and "The Watershed of 1637." Condensation is necessary where so large a ground must be covered, but this has been done with much skill and with a just apportionment of emphasis.

A GENERAL SKETCH OF EUROPEAN LITERATURE IN THE CENTURIES OF ROMANCE. By Laurie Magnus. New York: E. P. Dutton & Co.; $7.

Foreign Trade.

Whatever convictions we may hold as to the follies of internationalism in politics, it is certain that commercial internationalism will be extended by the war. America must necessarily become the greatest of the world's markets, but the extent to which we shall profit by that development depends upon our facility in learning the rules of the game.

It is to this object that the authors have directed their efforts. It is not enough to produce commodities. We must know also how to sell them, and we must understand the laws that govern foreign exchange. There are, moreover, certain heresies that must militate largely against a true commercial success. It is not to the advantage of any country that its exports should exceed its imports. A country profits from what it receives rather than from what it gives. Foreign trade, say the authors, is only profitable when it adds to the comfort, the ease, the gratification of the people as a whole.

These are but some of the very many questions dealt with by the authors in their substantial volume. The problems of credit, advertising, raw materials, foodstuffs, freight, insurance, and government aid are handled, not only with conspicuous knowledge, but with a clarity that brings them within the reach of every one.

THE FOREIGN TRADE OF THE UNITED STATES. By L. C. Ford and Thomas F. Ford. New York: Charles Scribner's Sons; $3.

Sunny Ducrow.

We all like to read of young and beautiful actresses who win their way from the lowliest origins to the heights of fame and fortune. Many novelists have tried their hand at this and the results are usually improbable but pleasing.

Mr. Henry St. John Cooper is the latest in the field with his "Sunny Ducrow." Sunny, when we make her acquaintance, is working in a pickle factory in the east of London. A celebrated actress notices her and discerns her possibilities, and from that moment the future of Sunny is assured. She has a passable voice and a genius for acting. Moreover, she is a thoroughly lovable little soul, quick with her sympathy and help and with the uncanny cleverness learned only in the slums. Sunny can take care of herself, and she does so with good result. Suitors crowd her path and Sunny eventually makes an unexpected choice which is one of the charms of the story.

But we are inclined to think that the author's enthusiasm has carried him into exaggerations. Sunny is sixteen when we first meet her. She is seventeen when we take leave of her. Now it is not impossible that so ambitious and clever a girl as Sunny should so improve her diction in the course of a year as to enable her to take leading parts and to wipe out all audible traces of her slum lingo. We are prepared to believe so much, but that she should also learn French and Italian within the same period, and to the accompaniment of her engrossing stage work, is wholly incredible. Lord Macaulay might conceivably have done it, but no one else. Nor can we understand how she acquired the business acumen which she displays in the creation of the new pickle factory in the country which is to take the place of the wretched hole in which she passes her early childhood. The author would have been well advised to tone down these extravagances and to leave Sunny's achievements within the domain of the credible. None the less Sunny is a charming girl and we are glad to know her.

Briefer Reviews.

"A More Christian Industrial Order," by the Rev. Henry Sloane Coffin (the Macmillan Company), is an attempt to apply the teachings of Jesus to the social conditions of today. It is written suavely and with moderation.

It is good to see that the Home University Library is still being extended. The latest addition is "Political Thought in England from Locke to Bentham," by Harold J. Laski. The Home University Library is published by Henry Holt & Co.

A recent addition to the National Social Science Series in course of issue by A. C. McClurg & Co. (75 cents) is "Housing and the Housing Problem," by Carol Aronovici, Ph. D. The book emphasizes not so much the sanitary aspect of housing as the development of a programme of housing reform.

"Claude's Second Book," edited by L. Kelsey-Bamber (Henry Holt & Co.), is a continuation of "Claude's Book," which contained a series of supposed post-mortem communications from a young aviator who was killed in the war. The reader must form his own conclusions as to their authenticity.

The Great Spirit's Fire.

Down in the Spavannah hills, near the little hamlet of Murphy, Oklahoma, there burns an Indian camp-fire that has not been quenched for fifty years. It is the watch fire of the Cherokees, a fire that is kept burning as a memento to the Great Spirit that the Indians remember his goodness to them and that their hearts are true.

No one knows when the fire was kindled, not even Chief Charlie Tee Hee, but B. F. Abernathy, a white man who lives in Murphy, says it was burning thirty-three years ago when he took up his residence there. It does not always show signs of life, but down in the cone of ashes that has accumulated in the long years it has been going until it is three feet high are embers that are kept alive by an insulation of a gum that is taken from a tree (says a writer in the Daily Oklahoman). Many of the Indians believe the fire can not die on account of it being a symbol of a covenant between God and man.

On special occasions, such as stomp dances, the fire is allowed to become a good-sized camp-fire and then the braves sit around it and smoke a peculiar pipe, an act that renews the individual covenant of each, but he it great or small the fire is kept alive by an attendant, the present one being George Potato, on whose land the ceremonies are held.

"Pacific Service" to Its Electric Power Consumers:

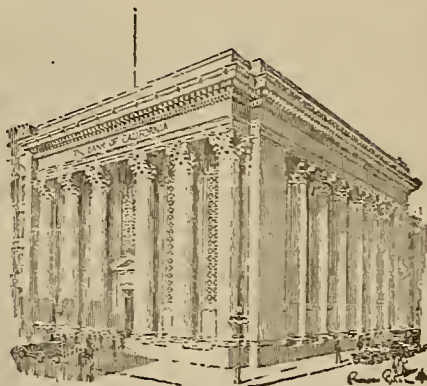

The following order, No. 113, effective as of August 19th, has been issued by the Power Administrator of the Railroad Commission of the State of California:

- (1) The use of electric energy for power purposes, except domestic use and use in connection with growing crops and handling of perishable foods, shall be reduced 20 per cent.
- (2) The use of electric energy for the irrigation of vacant lands and of lands from which crops have already been harvested shall not be permitted during the present shortage.
- (3) The attention of consumers of power for the irrigation of growing crops shall be called to the fact that unless a large reduction is voluntarily made drastic restrictions will become necessary.
- (4) The power companies shall direct the attention of the city officials in their territory to the fact that electric energy used in street, sign and display lighting is being lost for productive purposes, and shall urge them to restrict this use as far as may be consistent with public safety.
- (5) The above reductions in the use of electric energy shall be made, as far as possible, between the hours of 7 A. M. and 10 P. M.

We respectfully urge our consumers to realize the importance of this order, which applies to all power companies operating in North-Central California. It has been made necessary by the shortage of water power occasioned by the unusual drought and consequent extreme diminution of stream-flow in the power sources of the state, to say nothing of the constantly growing demand for power for agricultural, industrial and other purposes.

We ask our consumers to assist the Power Administrator and ourselves in prompt compliance with this order, so that the various industries relying upon electric power for their operation and maintenance may not be called upon to suffer a further reduction of supply before the close of the present dry season.

Dreams.

A few years ago it would have been hard to find an audience for a serious hook on dreams, or even to secure an admission that the subject was one worth of investigation. But we have changed all that. The psycho-analyst has given respectability to the interpretation of dreams, and there is something more than a suspicion that dreams may sometimes be an indication of higher rather than of lower states of consciousness.

Dr. Walsh's discussion of dreams is particularly commendable for the entire absence of the Brahminical spirit and also of the far too common disposition of popular scientific writers to advance a theory and then to ignore or deny all the facts that oppose it. Dr. Walsh faces all the facts. He does not deny the actuality of prophetic dreams, nor of telepathy, nor of the phenomena of mediumship or spiritualism. But he recommends extreme caution. He searches for physical rather than metaphysical explanations, and he prefers to keep his feet on the ground so long as it is possible to do so. That is exactly as it should be.

Dr. Walsh's main object as a physician is to relieve pain and he recognizes that dreams, premonitions, dreads, and compulsions may cause very real pain and may easily be provocative of disease. It is mainly from this point of view that he writes. Even the most unregenerate of psychic researchers will welcome the discovery that strong common sense is not necessarily unfriendly to discovery along the mystic path and that the physician may play an important rôle in the work of unprejudiced investigation.

THE PSYCHOLOGY OF DREAMS. By William S. Walsh, M. D. New York: Dodd, Mead & Co.

Why Do We Die?

The fact that the author, Dr. Edward Mercer, was formerly Bishop of Tasmania, would lead the reader to expect a more or less orthodox religious disquisition. But he will be agreeably disappointed. The author considers the problem of death first from the point of view of physical science and then from the super-physical or ethical standpoint. His breadth of view may be judged from the fact that he refers to the doctrine of metempsychosis or reincarnation as "full of promise," surely a remarkable declaration from a bishop. The author devotes his third section to Monadology and a consideration of the life of the cell and of the monad. He concludes with a section on the higher aspects of the problem and with the assurance that we may be loyal to the teachings of science and at the same time indulge the hope for immortality. Dr. Mercer has written an entirely satisfying little book.

WHY DO WE DIE? By Edward Mercer, D. D. New York: E. P. Dutton & Co.; $2.

The Religious Consciousness.

It is perhaps well that one who writes about religion should define the meaning of the word. Professor Leuba has enumerated forty-eight definitions, to which he adds two of his own. But Professor Pratt is unwilling to select one of the fifty for his own use. He prefers to create a new one of his own, and so he tells us that religion is "the serious and social attitude of individuals or communities toward the power or powers which they conceive as having ultimate control over their interests and destinies." But might we not say with even greater accuracy that religion is the reverential attitude of individuals toward super-human intelligences?

But definitions are not very important, although expositions are. And here we have a very admirable exposition, and it is admirable mainly because it nowhere discloses the author's own preferences. Here it has the advantage over Miss Underhill, who never leaves us long in doubt as to her own affiliations.

Professor Pratt's object is to describe the religious consciousness, a large task, seeing that the varieties of the religious consciousness are as numerous as the human race. None the less there are certain convenient and popular categories that serve well enough for the purpose. Thus we find two good chapters on conversion, and no less than five on mysticism, by no means an overweight, considering the importance that mysticism is now assuming. And these chapters are particularly well done, displaying, not only a knowledge of mysticism, but a certain sympathy with its aims. Other important chapters are devoted to the subconscious as a factor in religion, the religion of children, crowd psychology and revivals, the belief in immortality and prayer. It is natural and proper that the author should lay emphasis on the religion of Christendom, but at the same time we have ample and liberal references to non-Christian faiths, and without those labored efforts to prove their inferiority which has often been considered indispensable by writers on comparative religion. Professor Pratt has written a hook that is probably the best of its kind and that is alike luminous and impartial. It should find a permanent place on the reference shelf of the library.

THE RELIGIOUS CONSCIOUSNESS. By James Bisset Pratt, Ph. D. New York: The Macmillan Company; $4.

Gossip of Books and Authors.

Pierre Benoit, author of "Atlantida," which won the French Academy prize as the best novel of the year, and which has just been published in this country, lived for most of his life in Northern Africa, where the story is placed. He is the son of an army officer who was stationed in Algiers, and he was brought up there and also did his military service there. He is a profound student of the country, its people, and its history.

Harry A. Franck, who has handed to his publishers the last of the copy for his forthcoming book, "Roaming Through the West Indies," leaves this week on a trip into Canada with E. A. Ross of the University of Michigan, author of "Principles of Sociology," "Russia in Upheaval," etc. Both authors go to Canada for rest and recreation, and not for work or copy.

Important among the fall biographies will be the "Memoirs of the Count de Rochecouart," which E. P. Dutton & Co. will publish in an authorized translation by Frances Jackson. The recollections cover the twenty-eight years from 1788 to 1816 and are filled with adventures of varied sorts in France and Russia, in the Napoleonic wars, and as commandant of Paris.

In spite of the general reaction against war books, the demand for "Home Fires in France," by Dorothy Canfield, author of "The Bent Twig," "Understood Betsy," etc., continues unabated. According to a recent announcement made by the publishers, Henry Holt & Co., "Home Fires in France" has just been reprinted for the seventh time. This book is a collection of true stories of wartime France.

A review of college ideals.

Mr. Aldrich's Custom.

Thomas Bailey Aldrich used to be one of the most regular customers of a certain Boston bookstore. Mr. Aldrich had made a good deal of money by writing and had married a good deal more. He lived in a fine house and had a big library, and spent a not inconsiderable part of his time in this bookstore, sitting on the counter and talking to the proprietor about new books that were published. Some of the new books Mr. Aldrich read as he sat on the counter, while the proprietor of the store sold a box of paper and envelopes to a cash customer. Two or three times every month Mr. Aldrich was likely to find among the new books one that he wanted to have on the shelves of his library. A man like Mr. Aldrich was always receiving suitably inscribed copies of books from authors and publishers, and when he found in the bookstore a hook he wanted he would go home and get one of his complimentary copies and bring it down and trade it in for the book he wanted.

Mr. Aldrich came down to the bookstore one year at the Christmas season. Lots of people were in buying paper and envelopes. The proprietor was very busy showing scented stationery. Mr. Aldrich interrupted him to give an order for a subscription to St. Nicholas. There was 10 cents profit for the bookstore in handling the subscription. It was Mr. Aldrich's first real money transaction in the store in thirty years. He went out. Half an hour later he was back again.

"Mr. Blank, Mr. Blank," he called to the proprietor in a high, thin voice, "you can cancel that subscription to St. Nicholas."

Those who remember the Alger Series of their boyhood days may find in some present-day situations duplicates of the heroes of volumes bearing titles such as "From Call Boy to President." On the Canadian Grand Trunk Railway, for instance, a real call boy, who calls crews for rail trains, recently drew $218 as a month's pay, which is more than the chief clerk, under whom he works, receives. The boy works a regular eight-hour day in the morning and another in the afternoon, drawing time-and-a-half wage for the latter. The recent demand for an eight-hour day doesn't seem to bother him. And he is probably one of many exceptions.

THE ORPHEUM.

Although Singer's Midgets are holdovers this week they naturally remain the big attraction. I saw their act all over again, and watched the perky little performers with renewed interest. I tried hard to place them in regard to age, but I give up. Some of them, I think, are at the child age, a number are adults. When we pause to realize how completely adult players can fool the public sometimes while assuming child rôles, it is not surprising that it is difficult to pass on the age of these little creatures, whose beads, faces, and features are so rounded as to give them a childish physiognomy. The womanly contours of the girls' figures enlighten us as to their status, but as for the males, some of the tiniest are among the seniors of the group. The little Sandow is evidently a youth, perhaps not yet twenty-one. The elephant trainer is rather mature. The Chinese magician is not exactly youthful; and so on. There are brothers and sisters among them, noticeable from the family resemblances. I suppose, with such a large assemblage of young people, romances must flourish. Some of them must be married couples, and perhaps even sustain the relation to each other of parents and children. That old joke about the grandma chorus girl permits the supposition.

A curious feature about these competent and unerring little performers is the impersonal way in which they do their stunts. No one seems to have any vanity, and not one lingers a moment to taste the sweet savor of applause. To see them the first time is to almost forget, in the automatic perfection of their performance, that they are not puppets. To see them a second time is to be very curious about their essential humanness.

"The Bee Hive" is the nearest approach to a playlet this week, although it is merely patter—more particularly well done by Clarence Oliver—with a play setting. Rent eviction is the motive, Georgie Olp figuring as a baby-voiced and baby-witted wife.

A really beautiful number on the programme is the Horlick and Sarampa Sisters dance number. Costumed appropriately, they give a couple of Hungarian dances. They are all three highly trained and exquisitely graceful, and Nidjy Sarampa looked like a lovely young Cupid in her solo dance.

And then—oh, what a fall!—in an effort to please the American public they gave the Tango Habanera, which ought to have been labeled the Tango Americano. Sborn of their glory, costumed in rather shabby dresses of the present period, all three lost in looks, grace, and charm. The dances they gave were violent muscular exhibitions; nothing beautiful, graceful, aesthetically and poetically appealing, as were the others.

Dave Harris is a syncopator, and he is certainly full to the brim of rhythm, but he ought to soften his rather harsh voice.

Lovett's Concentration is the usual mind-reading act, with considerable splurge to it, caused by the severe correctness of Mr. Lovett's accent and get-up, and the near-elegance of his female assistant, who, nevertheless, says "the party will receive a large legacy next week." Also five blindfolded musicians are on the stage and loudly discourse sweet music in response to telepathic requests. I thought that so much style and performance clouded the issue, but I'm willing to admit that I may be wrong.

Jimmy Duffy and Mr. Sweeney as "Russian entertainers" burlesque the average two-men vaudeville stunt, causing much satisfactory merriment thereby, Jimmy giving a particularly successful take-off of the bastard polish of the main performer. Both are accomplished tumblers, and the act went well.

The Arco Brothers have so much spangular tinsel on their curtain that it failed to make a sufficiently simple background for their acrobatic stunts. One of them gave a wonderful exhibition of segregated muscular movements. Why are these muscular displays so ugly, almost revolting, I wonder? Perhaps because the muscles are cultivated beyond the normal. Anyway, he is a wonder in his line.

Over the pig-grunting, hen-squawking "barnyard episode" of the Orren-Dreupair we will draw a veil. It is sufficient to say that there were plenty in the audience who derived a keen relish from Mr. Orren's life-like vocal imitations of various extremely unpleasant noises and phases in nature; a relish that it was difficult, nay impossible, to share. If the performer only had a sense of humor; but—

MODERN POETRY.

This is the age of organization, social or economic. I have just discovered, by reading Percy Mackaye's introduction to Howard Willard Cook's "Our Poets of Today," that there is a Poetry Society that meets once a year, and, to requote a phrase of Yeats quoted by Mr. Mackaye, makes it, no doubt, the principal object of the meeting "to articulate sweet sounds together."

It is a goodly thought, for poetry, like music—true poetry is music, indeed—should be heard, in order that we may fully appreciate its verbal felicity. Why else do we murmur its best-loved measures to ourselves, and fairly revel in the rare joy of hearing poetry read poetically?

I remember once hearing David Bispham recite Poe's "The Raven," and although we can not but acknowledge that that elegiac lay has few inspiring thoughts and is not the great poem it was once thought to be, still it remains a wonderful if outworn example of verbal music. It is a poem that almost lulls thought by its musically insistent refrains, but the sense of hearing is entranced by such melancholy music as this:

And his eyes have all the seeming of a demon's that is dreaming,
And the lamp-light o'er him streaming throws his shadow on the floor;
And my soul from out that shadow that lies floating on the floor
Shall be lifted—nevermore!

To evoke the memory of Poe, the scorned, the discredited—in his time at least—is to realize by contrast how appreciative is the world today to the numerous young singers who have lifted and relighted the trailing torch of poetry. We thought it was an age of prose, and lo! suddenly we found that not only are there many poets, but many, also, who know and love their works. Scarcely any of the only fairly intelligent readers of today but has heard of Alan Seeger, of Joyce Kilmer, of Edwin Markham, and of a dozen others. The war, of course, furnished a thrilling motive to inspire their young eloquence, but before the war the wave of poetry had begun to beat upon the shores of the world's materialism. It was so, at least, in England, in France, and in America.

These poets do not, perhaps, rise to the loftiest heights. There are few giants among them. But they give musical utterance to thoughts the world likes to share with them, often enshrining, perhaps, a comparatively slight idea in a lovely setting.

And they are not convention-bound. Listen to Hilaire Belloc:

Oh! that I had £300,000
Invested in some strong security;

Then would I chuck for good my stinking trade
Of writing tosh at 1s. 6d. a quire!
And spring, like burning Theseus undismayed
Right for the heavenly peaks of my desire. . . .
But that's all over. Here's the world again
Bring me the blotter. Fill my fountain-pen.

But the terrible scorn in Alfred Noyes' "A Victory Dance"—who can match it? It is the bottomless contempt felt by soldiers who returned from the best earth-hell we've ever raised, and saw the relieved, reckless world—that part of it that hadn't been badly hurt—celebrating the victory with mad gayety:

Fat wet bodies
Go waddling by,
Girdled with satin.
Tho' God knows why.

And as "the shadows of dead men watching 'em there" look on at the show and talk it over:

"Christ!" laughed the fleshless
Jaws of his friend;
I thought they'd be praying
For worlds to mend;
Making earth better,
Or something silly.
Like whitewashing hell,
Or Picca—dam—dilly."

One reproach only the poet makes in the midst of his savage disdain:

"We mustn't reproach 'em.
They're young, you see."
"Ah," said the dead men,
"So were we!"

Few who see this terrific indictment of Alfred Noyes but will read it through, and remember it and appreciate it; yes, even the revelers he scorns; here is another mood, written by Beryl Carter, that poetry-lovers will equally appreciate:

England—a meadow loud with bees,
Shadowed by honeyed linden-trees,
The color of a sunset sky—
For this men live—for this—they die.

Howard Willard Cook, who has compiled the book referred to some paragraphs back, gives us some interesting information as to present-day poets, which is rather pleasant reading when we recall that the poets of the past, unless they were well-beeled with an income, were obliged to register semi-starvation in a garret before they attained success. "Today," he says, "the poet has come into his own. He receives a fair price for his lines, and has forced the publisher out of his traditional rut with gasps of amazement that a book of verse could be listed as a best-seller."

So the modern poet, when he takes up writing poetry as an occupation, can be sure, if he is the real thing, that his verses will be read and loved. But still we cherish the works of the giants of past days. Recently the Argonaut reprinted in its "Old Favorites" column Bryant's "Thanatopsis." In the course of a couple of weeks I ran across half a dozen people who spoke with affection of this reunion with an old and well-loved friend, and one of them had turned to it for consolation when a valued, precious friend had died.

Hand-Sprinkling

Water bills paid by a householder in the Mission appear thus on our books:

May 7	400 cubic feet	$1.44
June 7	600 "	2.09
July 8	1600 "	4.49

As usual when consumption jumps suddenly, our Service Department advised an inspection of fixtures.

The householder asked us to make the examination. The report was as follows:

"There is no plumbing waste on your premises.

"But an unnecessarily large quantity of water is used on the garden.

"We desire to call your attention to the wastefulness of standing irrigators which give a continuous delivery of water.

"Watering should be done under light head. Surface wetting is all that is needed.

"When the ground is drenched, water either evaporates without doing much good, or filters away, taking with it the nutritive element of the soil."

Acting on this suggestion, the householder is using the hose instead of the standing irrigator.

These meter readings show the result:

July 22	14 days	643 cubic feet
Aug. 7	16 "	257 "

The August bill was $2.81 for 900 cubic feet, as against $4.49 for 1600 cubic feet the month before.

If hand-sprinkling continues, the September bill should be still lower.

THE STANDARD SINCE 1852

that if we dissected our shoe-soles we'd find paper between the leather layers. No doubt artificial silk is more than occasionally passed off on us for the real thing. All medicines or toilet creams composed of drugs in solution have grown very, very thin and solution. Cotton can occasionally be found in fabrics purporting to be pure wool, and silk can not be found in textures whose mercerized gloss favors the delusion glibly assumed by the seller that they have a blend of silk.

Well, we stand these things with American calm. Shrewd though we are reputed to be, we Americans are amazingly serene and equable when we are cheated. We seem to take it as part of the game of life. The newspapers howl, and tear their hair, and rend their garments as they shriek about tax-eaters, in the vain hope that we will arouse ourselves out of our Olympian calm, rear up on our hind legs, and violently expel said tax-eaters, for well do they know that there would be no difficulty whatever in installing a fresh lot of their own private, particular, pet tax-eaters. We are perfectly aware that the municipally-employed mechanics, street menders, etc., loaf on the job. We have been told so a thousand times, and have seen them do it. But what can we? It isn't our concern. And hitherto we go upon our way, aware that there is self-seeking, axe-grinding, cheating, corruption, all about us, for which we are paying. If every time these things were drawn to our attention and we were obliged to dig down in our own individual jeans to pay for them we'd hoil over and do something. But the treasury pays the bills, and we comfortably forget that we fill the treasury.

But I did realize a miserably petty form of profiteering lately, and now I am on the hoil. And I propose to hubble over to the extent of putting the poor, plucked, gullible purchaser on his guard.

Ladies, gentlemen! Have you noticed that there's been a mysterious shortage of your stocking feet lately? Of course all women have noticed that the manufacturers are economizing on them in respect to the leg-length of their stockings. As to the men's the termination of their socks is too much on the map, as it were. They've got to reach a certain height in order to reach the garter-harnessing. But with women's stockings there has often been a superfluity of the top material. Nowadays they are just long enough.

But the feet are not, because they are cheating us in respect to size. The price of stockings, of course, has soared to a fearful figure. But when we pay that figure we assume we are getting the article paid for. And we are not. They're running the sizes short in the factories to save on the material, and incidentally take it out of our feet, as well as out of our purses. Foot doctors say that it is just as important that the stocking should give toe-room as that the shoe should. And the toe-room has been mysteriously absent. In other words the size stamped on the stocking is an awful whopper, for the stocking is a full size and a half shorter than it purports to be.

If that isn't petty profiteering I'd like to know what is. And why don't they try it with gloves? Because we try them on in the shops and would find them out, while we never are vouchsafed the spectacle of charming ladies trying on their stockings in public.

What we can do, however, since we may not depend on the size numbers marked on the stockings, is to take our own measurements with us, and piously trust that in the factories—for I do not suppose the retail merchants have anything to do with this niggardly method of cheating the public—they will, in time, find a lot of unsold goods left on their hands, and will be obliged to restore the balance of things by marking sizes correctly.

Scotti Grand Opera.

On Monday morning, August 30th, the sale of single tickets for the engagement of the Scotti Grand Opera Company at the Exposition Auditorium, the week beginning October 4th, will open at the box-office of Sherman, Clay & Co. It is many years since Californians have welcomed Antonio Scotti, one of the brightest stars that ever illumined the grand opera stage, and they are overjoyed at the prospect of hearing him once again. The company selected from the ranks of the Metropolitan Opera House will number one hundred and fifty people, and will include Metropolitan stars of world-wide eminence, a large chorus and ballet, thoroughly efficient, and an orchestra under the direction of Gennaro Papi, leading conductor of the Metropolitan Opera House, and Carlo Peroni, leading conductor of the Scotti Grand Opera Company on its past three tours.

As revised for this engagement, with special stage and orchestra pit, the seating capacity of the Auditorium is reduced practically one-half, and, as was proved at the Democratic National Convention, every word can now be heard in the most remote corners of the building.

Mr. Frank W. Healy, under whose local direction the engagement will be played, announces that the sale of single seats will open at the box-office of Sherman, Clay & Co. on Monday, August 30th.

A 400-year-old fraud upon American zoölogists has just been reported at the London Zoölogical Gardens as disclosed by a contributor in the London Daily Mail. This four-century-old hoax has to do with the identity of the badger. For more than 400 years scientific Americans imagined that there were badgers on this continent and now along comes R. I. Pocock, curator of mammals to the London Zoölogical Society, and disrates the animal. An American badger was sent to the London Zoo and in order to make an instructive comparison it was put in a cage adjoining some British badgers. No one ever saw the animals in both cages simultaneously. The British badgers slept all day and the American sample all night. Mr. Pocock investigated, with the result that he placed the American beast in a totally new trihe.

The silk shirt craze has ended. In most stores silk shirts may be seen in the windows marked much cheaper than a few months ago. The farmers, although sharing in prosperity, never indulged in luxuries as many city workers did.

FOYER AND BOX-OFFICE.

The Curran Theatre.

"The Satires of 1920," Fanchon and Marco's super-revue, which is enjoying a phenomenal run at the Curran Theatre, starts on its third and last week tomorrow evening.

The show satirizes the motion-picture industry, the "shooting" of a dozen scenes in the attempt of a Texas oil king to produce a feature film giving chance at many spectacular revue numbers. In one of these Fanchon and Marco, America's premier dancers, add to their laurels. Vieing with this and other beautiful numbers is the up-to-the-moment comedy. Here Lloyd and Wells shine in a "shine" act, while Arthur West, John Sheehan, and Al Wohlman put themselves across with ease.

Eva Clark, billed as the prima donna, is one of the "leads," and the girls have an unusual combination of beauty and symmetry.

The hook is from the capable hand of Jean Havez, known to the nation through his work for Ziegfeld's Follies.

The Columbia Theatre.

Somebody said last week that the Western Union could well afford to declare dividends when J. J. Gottlob, manager of the Columbia Theatre, finally concluded telegraphic negotiations with Oliver Morosco in New York whereby the stay of the popular little authoress-star, Maude Fulton, has been extended one more week, so insistent has been the demand for seats ever since the opening two weeks ago. When it is known that the date of "The Humming Bird" première at Morosco's Little Theatre in New York had to be set back several weeks in order to make this possible it will be seen that extreme pressure had to be brought to bear on the booking powers in the East in order to accomplish the desired result, which is a happy one for everybody concerned, as the business done during the past two weeks has doubled that of any previous engagement of the magnetic Miss Fulton.

As is by this time generally known, Miss Fulton is seen as Toinette, a child-criminal of the Parisian capital. Nothing of this phase of life is pictured in the play, as Toinette has graduated to a modiste's establishment in New York. A touch of the Apache atmosphere, however, is imported for the thrilling climax of the second act, when Toinette and the picturesque Apache mute (Paisley Noon) are brought together. Here the mute, bent on compelling the girl to return to him, is seen in a typical Apache dance.

Miss Fulton has the able support of Henry B. Walthall, William Morse, Marie Walcam, Harland Tucker, Lea Penman, Paisley Noon, Grace Travers, Florence Oberle, Ernest Anderson, Mildred Cates, and Frank Whitson.

The Orpheum.

"The Love Shop," a thumbnail musical comedy, comes to headline the Orpheum hill next week, commencing Sunday matinée. "The Love Shop" possesses all the requirements of what vaudeville patrons demand. Eddie Vogt, with Harry and Grace Ellsworth, head the cast. Fred de Graesac wrote the book, Walter L. Rosemont the music, and Darl MacBoyle the lyrics.

"The Champion," a piece written in a vein of mingled humor and pathos, will include Mann Holiner in its cast. Sentiment and fun will go hand in hand throughout this piece, which is another Orpheum offering next week. "The Champion" tells the story of a boy's estrangement from his mother. After many years, she finds him as one of the contestants in a bout at a fight club. The sequel is declared tense with interest.

Lovett's "Concentration" is the one act which holds over.

Pretty Marie Gaspar, with a natural gift for delivery of melodies, will prove herself welcome. Charm only can result from her appearance.

Si Jenks and Victoria Allen will impersonate "small town wise crackers"; George Wilson and Ben Larson will mingle song, dance, talk, comedy, and acrobatics; Santucci, master accordionist, is another attraction in store; the Four American Aces will reveal their power as expert casters. Topics of the day and Orpheum Concert Orchestra will open the show.

The Alcazar Theatre.

"Peg o' My Heart," given this week with even greater success than before, will be followed next Sunday matinée by the first local staging of "Daddies." Of all the Belasco successes none has surpassed that of John L. Hobbie's wonderful comedy of childhood, middle age, and universal humanity. Its career in New York exceeded 500 performances; it exerted equal appeal in London and Australia. "Daddies" is about a number of American hachelors who at an annual reunion vote to adopt a group of foreign war waifs. When the children arrive the troubles—and first real joys—of their foster-fathers begin. A remarkable cast is assembled, with Inez Ragan

The oldest written code of laws yet discovered has been deciphered recently by a scholar in Paris from clay Nippur tablets. They date back 3000 years before Christ, 900 years before the Hammurahi code, and show a high state of civilization. We know much in our age. Advancement in science, government, arts, and invention has been prodigious in the last 200 years, but the fundamentals of human nature reach back as far as known records go, and invariably show that a knowledge of justice and right and wrong existed. What we have hoped to hear of for years from some ancient record is the story of the beginning of the use of cooked foods. It makes us miserable sometimes to think of the millions of people who had to live their lives away without ever knowing the delights of hot biscuits, fried chicken, and cherry pie.

Most birds' families do not keep together, but scatter upon leaving the nest. But the bluejay, bluebird, the kingbird, and a few others less generally known live together the greater part of the year, says John Burroughs.

VANITY FAIR.

How difficult it is to predict the course of human events or to foresee the ultimate effect of the forces that we so heedlessly unleash. These profound remarks are induced by a joyous proclamation from the clubs of New York to the effect that they have not been ruined by prohibition, and that the dreary forecasts of their demise have been unsustained. To this the cynic may reply that prohibition has not ruined the clubs because there has been no prohibition, but the clubs with one voice repudiate the allegation. They have obeyed the law in spirit and in letter, and now they find to their amazement that virtue has been its own reward. They never believed this before. Nor did any one else. But it is true. At least it has been true of the New York clubs. There were moments of doubt and dismay, of inner questionings as to why men went to clubs at all if not to drink, and whether they would continue to go when nothing but the effervescent blandishments of ginger ale could be obtained. But the questionings have been set at rest. The New York clubs are flourishing even more than before. There has been a slight change in what may be called the general atmosphere. Members who used to be habitués are not now so much in evidence as before, but on the other hand those who once came only at long intervals are now more regular in attendance. They come more often and they stay longer. But the gain, on the whole, has been to the club. Its safety is assured.

An astute observer gives us a reason for the sustained popularity of the club. He tells us there was once a feud between the wife and the club, but to a large extent it has now been healed as a result of prohibition. The wife had learned to associate the club with that kind of conviviality of which she had good cause to disapprove. It was connected in her mind with alcoholic refreshments and with the consumption of time and money. She believed that the club was often no more than an excuse for drinking and therefore she was "agin" it. But now she has withdrawn her opposition, at least to a large extent. There was a time when men prevaricated, to put it mildly, when they concealed the fact that their destination was the club. Now they proclaim it unaided, even when it is not true. The club has become a sort of sanctuary and the wife smiles upon it. And the club prospers on its enforced virtues.

Speaking of clubs, there has been some surprise expressed in the East at the fact that a well-known baseball manager was a member of a literary and artistic club. He was never supposed to have any literary or artistic proclivities, and as a matter of fact he had none. Why, then, did he select such apparently uncongenial surroundings?

Presumably for that very reason, that they were uncongenial. For why should we ask of the club that it continue for us the associations of the day? It is contrast that we should seek in our relaxations, and not similarities. If the doctor knew what was good for him, which of course he does not, he would join a club of, say, clergymen. And the clergyman would join an athletic club, and so on. In this way they would free themselves from the routine of the work-a-day world and would find themselves in an atmosphere of refreshing novelty where they would have no single point in common with their associates. Bret Harte once explained why he became a member of the Royal Thames Yacht Club. He said: "I never use a club until I am tired of my work and want relief from it. If I go to a literary club I am asked all sorts of questions as to what I am doing and my views on somebody's last book, and to these I am expected to reply at length. Now my good friends in Albemarle Street talk of their yachts, don't want my advice about them, are good enough to let me listen, and I come away refreshed."

In a similar way, says the New York Times, after relating the above incident, the baseball manager desired merely to loaf and invite his soul in an environment as different as possible from the one that his character and pursuits would seem to make native to him. At all events, it is well to recognize the existence of many men who are in clubs but not of them. Instead of seeking good company, they may be avoiding it when they go to their club. They would be acting on Montaigne's principle that there is no solitude like that of "populous cities." The higher the spirits in a club and the sprightlier the chatter, the more secure the isolation of the member who chooses to maintain it. There is the old story of the man who was once addressed by a neighbor, whom he did not know, at dinner in the Athenæum Club in London. "It has been rather a warm day." "It has; and I have been a member of this club for twenty-six years, yet you are the first person that ever spoke to me here." And the puzzling thing was that no one could tell whether he wanted to be spoken to, and did not resent this final impolite interruption of his thoughts and his digestion.

We don't seem able wholly to get away from the subject of prohibition, and so we note with interest a statement by the commissioner of public charities that there has been a large increase in the consumption of alcoholic drinks and that the number of persons treated in the alcoholic wards of Bellevue Hospital and Kings County Hospital is nearly as great as it was before the coming of prohibition.

But some new kind of nectar has come into vogue and the doctors do not know what it is. But it is peculiarly deadly. The commissioner says: "They are getting something that puts them out of business in a few minutes, from the reports made to our institutions. It is something like the so-called knock-out drops. The victim goes down in a hurry without warning, but recovers quickly—if at all. We have had a number of such cases recently."

Curiously enough, there are now no women patients, although before prohibition they were nearly as numerous as the men. One hesitates to believe that women are more law-abiding than men. Indeed we know that they are not, so we must suppose either that they are more cunning than men in concealing their derelictions, or that they can not get the stuff. Probably both. But there is something to be said for the new liquid. It does not produce delirium tremens. One of the physicians at Bellevue says: "The stuff acts quickly both ways. In nearly every case it is found that the person has had only one or two drinks, after which his mind becomes blank. He knows nothing until he awakens in the institution the next morning."

That leisurely and immortal corps of lexicographers, the French Academy, has just ushered into the official French dictionary the word "gentleman" (says the Times). It is to have the "metaphorical and moral sense" of the French word "gentilhomme"; that is the sense of "well-bred, with fine manners," as the "Nouveau Larousse" defines "gentleman." Larousse also includes "gentleman-rider," defined as an "elegant man, who likes to ride horseback," and as a "sportsman who rides horses, and so on."

"Gentilhomme" meant originally a man of noble origin, just as "gentleman" meant a man of gentle birth. "Gentilhomme" applied originally only to such a person, not to one who became noble by holding certain offices or who was ennobled by "letters of the prince." One curious use of the word was the phrase, "Gentilhomme verriers," gentleman glassmakers. Nobles could engage in the manufacture of glass without loss of caste, without contaminating their nobility. It used to be a popular delusion in France that a glassmaker was ennobled by his business. An ennobled plebeian was called "a parchment gentleman." A country gentleman of middling fortune was curiously styled in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries "a hare-gentleman," gentilhomme à lièvre.

Vice-President Fletcher of the Fort Dearborn Bank of Chicago reveals our national strength, and in so doing gives us a true forecast of our future, in these statistics of America's possessions: "Twenty-four per cent. of the world's agricultural production achieved by 5 per cent. of the world's population; 40 per cent. of the world's mineral production; manufacturing 35 per cent. of all the world's goods; a foreign trade balance of $5,000,000,000; half of all the world's gold is in the United States; our bank deposits are billions in excess of all banks in all the world. Americans own today a billion of American securities owned abroad before the war; our allies, as nations, owe us $10,000,000,000, and almost as much more in other ways." So one could go on calling the endless roll of America's resources, America's sound reason for optimism, America's vision of a future in which peril is a bad second to pluck, in which Mr. Timidity is the only person likely to find the door of opportunity and achievement closed.

STORYETTES.

Grave and Gay, Epigrammatic and Otherwise.

A tourist reports seeing the following police regulation posted up in Ireland: "Until further notice every vehicle must carry a light when darkness begins. Darkness begins when the lights are lit."

The attorney for the gas company orated at length concerning the virtues of his corporation client. "I say, as the poet said," he stormed in closing, "Honor the Light Brigade." And out of the courtroom crowd came a voice: "Oh, what a charge they made!"

The conductor and a brakeman on a Montana railroad differ as to the proper pronunciation of the name Eureka. Passengers are often startled upon arrival at this station to hear the conductor yell: "You're a liar! You're a liar!" Then from the brakeman at the other end comes the cry: "You really are! You really are!"

To the rear door of the house of a lonely spinster in a Pennsylvania town there recently came a seedy-looking person, who, after being given some food, made so hold as to proffer this additional request: "Missus, ask your husband if he aint got an old pair of trousers to give me?" Whereupon the spinster, anxious not to expose her solitude, replied: "I am sorry, my good man, but he—er—never wears such things."

A New Englander tells of a merchant in a Vermont town whose goods did not very strongly substantiate his advertising claims. So he put out a new sign. He was pleased to observe that a great many people stopped to read it. But soon he was puzzled and angered to notice that they all went on, laughing. There was nothing humorous about the sign, for it merely read: "If You Buy Here Once You Will Come Again." The merchant went out in a casual sort of way and glanced at his sign to see what was the matter. Some one, no doubt a former customer, had added another line, and it now read: "If You Buy Here Once You Will Come Again to Bring It Back."

A freight crew on the Toledo division of the B. & O. Railroad was up on the carpet because of a trifling accident. The road foreman was questioning a brakeman. "Where were you when the accident happened?" "In the cahoose talking with the hoys." "What were you talking about?" "Oh, just railroad talk." "What do you mean by railroad talk?" "Why, whisky, women, and hack pay, of course."

After a few hours with the rod and line on the river, Childley was enjoying a quiet smoke and drink at the Cross Keys, when in popped Badger, an old acquaintance. "What sport have you had today, Childley?" asked Badger. "Only one—a trout!" replied the man with the rod. "Good one?" ventured Badger. "Well," said Childley, "I've not weighed him yet, but I'll tell you this—when I pulled him out the water went down three-quarters of an inch."

William E. Anderson, the Anti-Saloon League's clever head, said at a tea in New York: "Some of these rich New Yorkers are hopeless. A rich New Yorker's wife said to him the other evening at dinner: 'Stuyvesant, the chauffeur came home drunk this afternoon. You must discharge him at once.' 'Discharge him?' yelled Stuyvesant. 'Are you crazy? I'll raise his wages and go out with him myself tomorrow afternoon. Maybe he'll take me where he got it.'"

"A cat sits on my fence every night and makes the night hideous with his infernal row. Now I don't want to have any hother with my neighbor, but this nuisance has gone far enough, and I want you to advise me what to do." The young lawyer looked as solemn as an owl and answered not a word. "I have a right to shoot that cat, haven't I?" "I would hardly say that," replied the young lawyer. "The cat does not belong to you, as I understand." "No, but the fence does." "Ah!" exclaimed the light of the law, "then I think you have a perfect right to tear down the fence."

Johnnie Cooke, character actor now engaged with Edith Roberts in the feature, "Alias Miss Dodd," was in a hurry to get home recently and hoarded a car without removing the white make-up from his hands, face, and hair. The car was crowded and he sat next to a colored laborer. "Whar you wukkin'?" asked the darky. "At Universal City," answered Cooke, good-naturedly. "Whut they payin'?" was the next question. "Hundred and fifty," replied Johnnie. "That aint much," observed the colored man, "that's only five a day." "A hundred and fifty a week," corrected Cooke. The other looked at him incredulously. "Go long, man; they haint no plasterer gittin' sich money as that."

Judge Elbert H. Gary said at a dinner in New York. "If a man wants to succeed, if he works hard to succeed, he will succeed. Show me a failure, and I'll show you Jeff Langhorne, or at least Jeff Langhorne's counterpart. Jeff lounged in front of the general store one fine morning, whittling a stick, chewing tobacco, and growling about the hard

IN BEAUTIFUL PIEDMONT, commanding a most magnificent view of San Francisco Bay and the Marin County Hills.

THIS SUPERB residential Park is situated on the Sunniskist slope of the Fashionable Piedmont District and is absolutely protected from disagreeable winds.

THIS PARK has been subdivided so the contours of the land give each homesite a natural setting. This will appeal to appreciative people, who desire something different from the ordinary flat level land without inspiration or artistic merit.

ONLY FIFTEEN of these remarkable homesites of from one to four acres; each one furnishing a most picturesque location for a home of dignity and refinement.

OVER ONE MILLION DOLLARS of Piedmont's finest homes adjacent to Piedmont Estates.

CAREFULLY RESTRICTED to home costing from $10,000 upward.

THIS UNIQUE LOCATION, the splendid plans prepared for the development of this beautiful residential Park, prepared by landscape Engineers of note, and the perfect building restrictions combine to make this a home place of distinctiveness and individuality.

times. 'Haint no money in farmin' no more,' he said. 'Guess I'll hev ter sell out and go live on my son-in-law.' 'No money in farm-in'!' shouted the storekeeper indignantly. 'No money in farmin', with wheat the price it is and the whole world clamorin' for bread?' 'Nothin' doin', said Jeff Langhorne. 'Nothin' doin' in my case so fur as wheat goes.' 'Why not? Aint you got the land?' 'Oh, yes, I got the land, all right.' 'Aint ye got the seed?' 'Yes, I got the seed, but—' 'But what, consarn ye?' yelled the storekeeper. Jeff Langhorne shook his head mournfully. 'My old woman,' he said, 'is too dumb lazy to do the plowin' and sowin'.'

Miss Caroline, daughter of a Southern household, had just returned from college, and was not altogether familiar with the domestic arrangements in her home. Guests came in suddenly at supper-time, and as her mother was absent it fell to her lot to look after them. After asking them to stay for supper, she went to the kitchen, presided over by a "black mammy," of the sort that has almost disappeared, to make the necessary arrangements for the meal. Eliza, the mammy, was busy stirring some concoction when Miss Caroline entered the kitchen, and said: "Mammy, we have company for supper, and I want you to have some hot waffles for them." "Can't make no waffles, Miss Car'line," was the reply, as the stirring continued vigorously. "Mis' Mary, she always make de waffles." Miss Mary was the mother. "Well, we'll have hot biscuits, then," the girl said. "Can't make no biscuits. Mis' Mary, she always make de biscuits." "Stir up a quick cake, mammy," was the next order. "Can't make no cake, Miss Car'line. Mis' Mary she always make de cake," and the stirring continued. Out of patience, the girl said sharply: "Mammy, we have company and you must make something extra for them. You must!" Looking up quickly, when she detected the change in tone, Eliza put her hands on her broad hips, while a smile spread over her expansive countenance, followed by a hearty chuckle. "Law, Mis' Car'line, I can make all dem things. You and me is jes' alike, aint we honey—we don't do nothing us kin get out of doing, does us?"

THE MERRY MUSE.

A Pacifist?

When any advocate of strife
His views on strategy expounds,
I gleefully review with him
The battles of the Polo Grounds.

I love the crash of bat and ball,
The raucous cheering and the din;
The dust of conflict at the plate,
When the last winning run slides in.

I cheer the lusty "hit and run,"
Nor are my eyes to tactics closed;
Yet—call me any name you choose!—
To ruthless baseball I'm opposed!

—James Owen Tryon in New York Herald.

A Ballade of Vacations.

Some are all for quiet, some are all for noise,
Some for jazz and "shimmy," some for pastures green;

Anyway, we're off and out, working girls and boys,
Leaving for the country by the Five Fifteen!
Human beings once again—not parts of a machine,
No one now to boss you, and no one else to please,—

Every little salsadly once again a queen—
Free at last to kiss your girl underneath the trees.
Time-clocks forgotten, and all such base annoyances—
Keep it up till morning! the going's good and keen!

Three weeks out of fifty-two, we'll take our fill of joys;
Time was made for slaves, girls—speed the limousine!

When a fellow's twenty, and she's but seventeen,
O it's good to be alive, and take her on your knees,
Then we know what pleasure is, and all that life can mean—

Free at last to kiss your girl underneath the trees.
O but I am sorry for those poor city guys,
Rushing for the subway, while here my head I lean

Peaceful on your shoulder, dear, in bliss that never cloy,
It sure must make God happy only to have seen
Two that were as happy as you and I have been!
Ah! little sweetheart, too fast the good time flees,
But a few short days are left now for us to glean—

Free at last to kiss your girl underneath the trees.

ENVOI.

Darling, will you promise that none shall come between Your heart and my heart, no kiss be sweet as these
We have kissed together, with none to intervene?—
Free at last to kiss my girl underneath the trees.

—Richard Le Gallienne in Judge.

Mr. and Mrs. William Roth are being congratulated upon the birth of twin daughters.

What is the real explanation of the fact that so many of our birds nest so near our dwellings and yet show such unfriendliness when we come near them? Their apparent confidence on the one hand contradicts their suspicion on the other. Is it because we have here the workings of a new instinct which has not yet adjusted itself to the workings of the older instinct of solicitude for the safety of the nest and young? My own interpretation is that birds are not drawn near us by any sense of greater security in our vicinity. It is evident from the start that there is an initial fear of us to be overcome. How, then, could the sense of greater safety in our presence arise? Fear and trust do not spring from the same root. Hunted animals pursued by wolves or hounds will at times take refuge in the haunts of men, not because they expect human protection, but because they are desperate and oblivious to everything save some means of escape. If the hunted deer or fox rushes into an open shed or a barn door, it is because it is desperately hard-pressed, and sees and knows nothing but some object or situation that it may place between itself and its deadly enemy. The great fear obliterates all minor fears.—John Burroughs in Harper's Magazine.

When the eggs on the ostrich farms in California are on the point of hatching, a curious tapping of the shells may be heard. The sound is caused by the chicks inside the eggs endeavoring to break out. Those which can not easily emerge are assisted by the mother bird, which will sometimes break an egg from which the telephoning is heard by pressing it carefully, and will then aid the chick to get out. At the Pasadena farm the sight of a boy riding an ostrich as he would a pony may sometimes be seen.

Approximately 40 per cent. of the population of Oregon does not have access to free public libraries, representing almost 300,000 persons not provided with free library service, according to the estimate of the United States Bureau of Education just made public.

Women have been made eligible for the Victoria Cross, the most highly valued British military honor.

My Troubles.

I took my troubles up the road
All on a summer morning;
The sun from out its blue abode
The meadows was adorning.
My troubles were a sorry pack;
They clung like care upon my back.

And there was Doubt, a dubious thing,
And there was foolish Fretting;
And there was Sorrow, with its sting,
And hollow-eyed Regretting,
A grievous brood to bear along
When all the air was filled with song.

Then came I to the wide free crest
With naught but sky above me;
A soothing wind my cheek caressed;
Met thought it seemed to love me;
And there breathed upward from the earth
The fragrant messages of mirth.

And seeing far below me roll
The lands so green and spacious,
My troubles lifted from my soul,
And life again grew gracious.
And so I trod the downward road
Without a trouble for a load!

—Clinton Scollard in New York Sun.

Lure.

From Trinidad to Mexico is sixteen miles.
I have ridden it by daylight—I have ridden it by stars.

I have made the trip as easy as a careless woman smiles,
Out across the trackless desert, just to earn my shoulder-bars.

But that was many years ago. My soldiering is done.

I've no doubt the outfit's scattered clear from Saturn to the sun;
Building rainbows in the skies,
Where high heaven's mystery lies.
From Trinidad to Mexico is sixteen miles.

Oh, I have no poignant hopes remaining—long ago they died.

I have got a Bird of Paradise to keep in musk and gold—

I've a canker in my mem'ry and a brier in my side:

I am like a stranded vessel with no cargo in the hold.

There's a solemn sort of glory in the desert after night:

It makes the pulse beat thicker just to see the sand so white.

And the desert in the dawn
Is a thing to look upon.

From Trinidad to Mexico is sixteen miles.

I have seen the boys go marching out in steady, weary files:

Go marching out at morning and come marching in at night—

I was just a foolish fellow whom a silly word beguiles:

And I caught a Bird of Paradise that passed me in its flight.

But I wish that I were back again along the desert waste—

With alkali to burn my eyes and cauterize my taste.

For there's magic when the sun
Turns the desert back to dun.

From Trinidad to Mexico is sixteen miles.

—Joseph Andrew Galahad in Life.

"Piazas" I have written throughout (says Mrs. Schuyler Van Rensselaer in Scribner's Magazine), and I insist upon the name as I insist upon the thing. It is not very clear from what suggestions our forefathers, in post-Colonial days, developed the thing, and it is not clear at all how they came to adopt for it an Italian name, changing the significance as well as the sound. In the South they have always said "gallery," and here at the north "porch" now appears to be displacing "piazza." But these are rightly the names of other things, and while there can, of course, be no objection to the orthodox English "veranda," it seems a pity to abandon a distinctively American name for a distinctively American kind of veranda.

Sparrows have lived to be forty years old. A horse does not live much more than twenty-seven years. Cats get to be about thirteen years old. The tortoise is supposed to live to be between 300 and 400 years old. Some persons say toads can live forever, but, of course, that has not been proved, though certainly they live to an exceedingly great age. Both an eagle and crow have been known to live to be 100, but the wren lives only about three years. An elephant's lifetime is about 100 years, but he isn't regarded as grown up until he is about twenty-five years old.

OLD-STYLE SMUGGLER.

Will the faltering demise of John Barleycorn result in the rejuvenation of the old style type of smuggler and cause him to appear once again in the flesh as he is now pictured in the romantic pages of fiction? This is a question that is causing great concern among the Federal authorities to whom is entrusted the task of seeing that the Eighteenth Amendment is carried out to the full letter of the law and the statutory prohibition made a realistic fact.

Millions of dollars yearly must be expended by the Federal government to prevent the hardy and adventurous mariner of romance from stepping out of the printed pages and seeking new and ingenious means of evading the ever-watchful revenue cutters. It will be a difficult task, for many of this type have already succeeded in running the gauntlet of the revenue cutters and have brought their lugger of liquor to anchor in some hidden cove where the priceless cargo could be shipped inland and sprung in some quiet locality as an oasis for the parched mourners of the great American desert.

Customs inspectors along the Mexican border have been greatly handicapped in their efforts to stamp out illegal smuggling. In a letter from the United States marshal for the western district of Texas which was read to the House by Mr. Ashworth some of these difficulties are pointed out. The letter said in part:

"The customs officials of El Paso are doing splendid work with their limited number of men, but the number is entirely inadequate, as is shown by the increasing number of smugglers operating in this vicinity."

The same situation is being faced by the customs officials in many other parts of the country and in order to curb the attempts of the bootleggers and smugglers, the personnel of the customs officials will have to be greatly increased. Every vessel arriving from foreign ports will have to be searched and a close surveillance over the crews while the vessels are in port will have to be maintained. With such safeguards as patrolling the thousands of miles of border on foot, horse, automobile, and motorcycle, the inspection of the thousands of automobile and foot passengers crossing the international boundary lines that require inspection, along with the surveillance to be maintained along the coasts, it can readily be seen the added expense which will be entailed by the government.

The wet province of Quebec looms up as a very promising base for the illicit smuggling of "booze" into the northeastern section of the country. St. Pierre and Miquelon are also ideal bases, especially for foreign wines and liquors. The coast line of Maine is very tortuous and Breton fishermen would find it not difficult to bring their spirituous cargo out as ballast from France.

All this means a wider field of activity for the coast guard, the strong arm of the customs service. Preparations are being made to fight the new hands of smugglers which might spring up as a result of prohibition. Commodore E. P. Bertholf, the head of the organization, was only too glad to tell how the service will go about fighting a possible recrudescence of romantic smuggling.

"Smuggling in bulk," he said, "has always been found a difficult operation because of the strict and systematic watch kept on the movements of all vessels; each individual craft being required to be duly registered, to carry certain papers always ready for inspection and to otherwise account for her movements. The chances of smuggling on a large scale being successful are about one in ten, and for this reason few intelligent skippers will take the chance of being detected, with the consequent seizure of the ship."

"The guard kept by the revenue cutters at sea is supplemented by the beach patrol. By night and day the shore line is divided into 'beats' and kept under surveillance. The main object in this watch is to keep a lookout for wrecks and vessels in distress. But it works also as a force against smugglers."

"Because of this watch there is only a slight chance of smugglers landing and concealing goods in the old-time fashion. Small sailing ships might turn the trick now and then. In fact we are preparing a gauntlet for any schooners from Cuba that may now try to land cargoes of rum at one point or another on the Florida or gulf coasts. We realize that big risks no doubt will be taken because of the price that 'booze' will now fetch."

"Because of this fact we will have to take greater precautionary measures. A fast patrol fleet will no doubt prove an effective method of breaking up the profitable practice of smuggling booze. There is no money in smuggling on a small scale, except with such articles as opium and diamonds. Booze will no doubt cause many new attempts to evade the revenue cutters."—Oregonian.

Carborundum, the artificial substitute for emery, which is said to rival the diamond in hardness, is used, because of its extraordinary resistance to heat, as coating for the interior of furnaces. Finely powdered and made into a paste, it is applied with a brush, like paint, to the brick lining. It is said that a layer only two millimeters thick will protect the bricks from the effects of the highest temperature that is ever produced in ordinary furnace combustion. Carborundum is itself a product of the electric furnace, being composed of silica and carbon fused in the presence of salt and sawdust.

American gold coins are being destroyed and melted into jewelry by Spanish goldsmiths, who are procuring all the American gold pieces possible. The American gold piece contains purer gold than those of European countries.

Tuesday's Election.

In the senatorial primary campaign ended in Tuesday's election Mr. Wallace, a political nondescript posing as a Republican, a shyster champion of many "isms," a Chatauqua-type spieler, ran tail-ender. Mr. Kent, an eccentric radical impudently pretending to be a Republican but in truth a Wilsonian, a man of full—and wide open—purse, ran a bad second. Mr. Shortridge, a straight Republican without reservations or apologies, pledging only loyalty to party principles and a virulent anti-Wilsonism, came in at the head of the poll a smashing winner. In this outcome there is a significance as relating to the political status of California both instructive and edifying. Plainly our people have come to the point of recognizing the values, political and social, that abide in stability in policies inspired by common sense under the standards of a sound nationalism. This result tends to lift California from the discredited list of crank states.

Regarded as a political incident, this outcome of the California primary is hardly less notable in its national significance. With some reason California has of late come to be regarded as a species of political barometer. Its population, drawn from many sources, domestic and foreign, is pretty fairly representative of the country at large. An election therefore which indicates a wholesome return to established standards in political sentiment and action is worth attention as indicating the mood and spirit of the country, broadly regarded.

The nomination of Mr. Phelan by the Democrats was a foregone conclusion, he having no competitor in his own party. Now begins a second campaign—a straight contest between Shortridge, Republican, and Phelan, Democrat. In the registration the Republicans have an overwhelming majority, and if those who have voted as Republicans for Kent and Wallace stand faithfully to the engagement implied in their participation in the primary there will be no question about the result. Whatever doubts may be felt on this score are based upon the suggestion that various elements that gave support to Kent and Wallace in Tuesday's primary have been only masquerading as Republicans and that in the final show-down they may not be counted upon. None the less all the omens point to Republican success in November, with the election to the Senate of the party nominee.

The issue is of grave importance. The country very obviously is weary of Wilsonism. Mr. Harding will almost certainly be the next President. He ought to have the support that a Republican senator from California could give him. And by the same token California ought to have such measure of influence in the making and carrying out of national policies as the presence at Washington of a Republican senator in the place of Mr. Phelan can give her.

Campaign Buncombe.

The Democratic party won the presidential election in 1912 on a platform that declaimed against the high cost of living, that charged the Republican party with being responsible through the operation of its "robber tariff" for multitudinous mischiefs and that promised to cut down general prices and to reduce the number of useless officials. It is true that a breach in the Republican party was the essential fact as related to the outcome; none the less the Democratic campaign was based upon the pledges above outlined—pledges that greatly impressed the country and brought multitudes of voters to support of the Democratic candidates. What happened? The Democratic party came into authority in March, 1913, and between that date and the breaking out of the great war the cost of living advanced 12 per cent. Between the time the Democratic party took possession of the government and the entrance of the United States into the war the number of Federal officials and employees increased in round numbers forty-five thousand. Of course since our entrance into the war there have been enormous increases both in the cost of living and the number of persons in the Federal service; we do not emphasize these increases because there have been special reasons, although there is none to claim that these reasons justify the extravagances that have ruthlessly advanced the cost of living and stuffed the national official roster. The significant fact is that the Democratic party has made no effort toward carrying out the pledges under which it came into control of the government.

In 1916 the Democratic party triumphed on the assertion that its administration of the government had "kept us out of war." The phrase has become a symbol of shame. It is now confessed by no less an authority than President Wilson himself that at the very time the campaign cry "kept us out of war" was winning the election it was plain to those on the inside of things that we were bound to get into the war. The cry "kept us out of war" was mere campaign buncombe and is admitted to have been such.

Unless we mistake the public mind, these examples of campaign practice have yielded a natural reaction of disgust and resentment. In the language of the street they "have put bunk on the blink." It no longer has credit with anybody having sense enough to come in out of the rain. And this is why Governor Cox's absurd charge in the matter of the Republican campaign fund falls flat. It is nothing more nor less than "bunk," intended to divert attention from the real issues of the campaign. If for the moment it has a measure of public attention it is of small significance, since the truth when it shall be brought out will surely discredit both the statement and its author. Likewise the absurd counter-charge made by some small busy-body in the Republican organization to the effect that the British government through its ambassador at Washington is financing the Cox campaign will fall to the ground. The one charge, like the other, is unworthy, contemptible, fraudulent. Governor Cox should be ashamed in the first instance; and in the second the Republican campaign administration should disavow responsibility, cast out from its official organization the chump whose cheap temerity has promulgated a patent absurdity.

The Kenyon committee of the Senate is doing a real service by calling the chairmen of both campaign committees before it and getting from them all the facts as to the sources of the means with which their operations are being conducted. If rich men and corporations are putting up the "fifteen millions" charged by Governor Cox, or anything like this sum, the truth ought to be known. Chairman Hays has declared that only moderate sums have been asked for or received, and if he has lied about it then let the fact be brought out and let Mr. Hays retire from his position in contempt and disgrace. Likewise in the matter of the Democratic campaign fund. If European countries or speculators are providing money for the Democratic campaign—the Argonaut does not for one moment believe they are—let us know it and let a stop be put to it. Further if it be true that public officials and employees are being assessed, as has been charged, by the Democratic committee let that fact be brought out.

There is no question about the attitude of the public mind with respect to this matter of campaign expenditure. The country will not consent that any party shall "buy the presidency" either by expenditure of money or by force of official patronage. The Republicans at Chicago rejected and rebuked candidates for its favor smirched by elaborate and costly pre-convention tactics. In the same spirit the Democrats at San Francisco rejected a candidate sought to be imposed upon the party through exercise of official authority and employment of official patronage. The public attitude is thus made clear. Give to the public the facts—no matter who is hit by them.

Prohibition as It Works Out.

Alaska, from Dixon's Entrance up to the high line where whisky freezes, refuses to go dry. The Philippine Islands, far down on the other side of the world, persistently remain wet. At home, stored private stocks of barreled and bottled cheer exhibit a strange persistence with an unexplainable recuperative power. Under official permit there is carried on for family consumption a considerable industry in Dago red. A new ruling has lifted the limit of prescriptions of wine by physicians. Sacramental privilege holds a generous mandate. "Moonshine" continues to brighten a theoretically arid world even in the dark of the moon. The cider mill, with some help from the raisin crop, tends to alleviate a stricken world. Even the farmer's silo serves the turn of certain elements with whom the "kick" is the real thing.

Incidentally we have it upon official authority that in many parts of the country bountifully supplied bars are openly maintained. In any of the larger cities there is no difficulty in quenching an urgent thirst, and widely through the country, either above board or below stairs, there are convenient and ready means by which parched throats may be made moist. For all the Eighteenth Amendment, notwithstanding the Volstead Act, in the face of state regulations, there is a plenty to drink for those who know how to find it. Even in New York City, where the police department works under an appropriation in the tidy sum of twenty-five million dollars, any soul athirst may find out "where to get it" by asking a policeman—and concurrently tendering him a cigar.

Now comes Prohibition Commissioner Kramer with the plaint that "hundreds of prohibition agents in New York and other cities are guilty of taking bribes from local saloon-keepers for protection." There is a pathetic candor in this admission. None the less Mr. Kramer might have gone further to confess that few among his precious crew of Nymbs, Pistols, and Bardolphins have been known to decline bribes. "The only solution," declares Mr. Kramer, "is an appropriation big enough for the job." The four and a half millions provided by Congress, it appears, merely serves to maintain a gang of scoundrels in a position where they may profit by betraying their trust. It is a sad business—truly a sad business! Mr. Kramer is not ready to admit the hopelessness of a "solution." He will ask for a bigger appropriation. But will Congress dig deeper into the public treasury to provide means for enforcement of a law odious to more than half the people of the country, a law incapable of enforcement by usual or even extraordinary methods of detection and prosecution? Verily it will not! No party will dare ask a further appropriation to enlist an augmented army of spies and busy-bodies. We should like to wager something handsome that when Congress comes to vote another time on this particular issue the sum to be devoted to enforcement of the Volstead Act will be cut down rather than increased.

In the meantime we have become a nation of law-breakers. Nobody whose habits or inclinations suggest evasion of the Volstead Act has the slightest compunction of conscience in doing it. Every second automobile that speeds anywhere into open country on a Sunday picnicking stunt contains somewhere in its innards liquid means of cheer; every second suitcase on any train holds a modicum of flaked joy; while the hip-pocket and boot-leg continue as of old their ministry to the gayety of the people.

In brief, extreme prohibition is a failure. Its restrictive effects are felt only by those who have not the means of evading the law—mostly poorer folk who have neither cellars nor attics nor the wherewithal of providing them. Thus the law puts no restraint where restraint is most needed, while bearing heavily upon non-privileged classes. True, the saloon has measurably been banished, but it was in the way of banishing itself when prohibition came into effect. And it may be added truly that if a tithe of the energy that has been immorally expended in ineffectual attempts to enforce universal prohibition had been exercised in legitimate warfare upon the saloon as a public nuisance, that worthy trick might have been turned completely and easily. In the effort to do too much—to go beyond the line of common acceptance—prohibition, like many another vaulting folly, has "o'erleaped its" and fallen on the other side."

Politics and "Ideals."

Nobody of observation or judgment or honesty will claim for American politics, or the politics of any country, that it is free from the faults inherent in human nature. The human vices of selfishness and of "management" in its various forms and phases inevitably work out in politics as they do in other things. But while in politics there is much to deplore, none the less we are dependent upon political action to sustain the machinery of the common interest and of civilization itself. No perfect means of government has yet been devised; and of the many forms that have been tried, government founded in the public will and carried out by means of parties comes most nearly to maintaining the ideals of social order and general equity. It would seem that persons of intelligence ought to know this, and, knowing, do their part to maintain the integrity of parties.

Yet there are many who decry parties and partisanship and who would if they could have their way substitute chaos for organization. Mr. Curtis, publisher of the Philadelphia Ledger, of the Saturday Evening Post, of the Country Gentleman, of the Ladies' Home Journal, and God knows what other advertising carry-alls, is very sure that parties are a blot on American civilization and that in them lies the weakness of our political system. Mr. Curtis and those who hold with him are not clear as to what system if any may be substituted for political parties to the end of permitting the people to express their views and to maintain results in government. Their outgivings would indicate that in their opinion good government is to be achieved only through scrapping the party system and putting political authority in the hands of an editorial oligarchy. In this theory they would seem to be in entire accord with that eminent patriot Mr. William Randolph Hearst, although he would be the last to find acceptance at their hands. The people, in the opinion of the Curtises, never vote their own minds nor for their own good. They—the Curtises—are in much better position to guide the people than the people themselves, a judgment characteristic of self-select groups in any period of which we have historical record. Parties and party politicians, in the view of the Curtises, always stand between them and the people and so obstruct good government.

Not very long ago large numbers styling themselves progressives held very much the same views. Their only use for parties was to smash them—a theory which recalls the philosophy of the late Lish Applegate of Oregon, who had "no use for towns excepting to raise hell in." Prominently associated with this school of thought only a little while back was one Arthur Capper of Kansas, whose enthusiasm in the cause of party annihilation led him first and with a fine consistency to form a party of his own and later to get himself made a "Progressive" senator, a position which he still holds and in which his views have been considerably broadened by working experience. In addition to his duties as a senator Mr. Capper still carries on a Kansas newspaper styled Capper's Weekly, and in the issue of that journal of August 21st he presents some reflections indicative of a reformed mind. In part he says:

A reader of Capper's Weekly is disappointed because with other Progressive Republicans I am standing by the G. O. P. He intimates all party government is a failure. Says the Democratic party now in power has proved its absolute lack of ability for rulership. Then winds up saying he will probably vote for a Democratic President. And he is quite serious about it, too, as every voter should be.

All governments fail more or less. The world still is seeking the most perfect form of government. It is a quest that must go on for ages.

Also it is true that the best form of government the world has found to date is the democratic form, government by the people through parties. The most progressive as well as the most intelligent peoples and nations of this day and age have this form of government.

"Only by uninterrupted agitation can a people be kept sufficiently awake not to let liberty be smothered in material prosperity," or mere wealth-getting, Wendell Phillips said long before the civil war.

This is just what party contests do. They keep the people awake politically, and that is one of their greatest benefits. The ideal situation for a country to be in is to have two big parties so closely contending for popular favor that both are compelled constantly to compete in good works and efficient government.

Capper's Weekly is personally conducted with a desire to promote the public good. It is not owned nor controlled by any "interest." Yet I am not presuming its views political and otherwise will suit everybody, nor am I assuming they always are right. That is impossible. I only ask you to believe I believe they are right and in the best interest of the greatest number. I make no claim to infallibility. I know I make mistakes just as other men do; it is human to err. But every man must choose. To be neutral gets us nowhere.

An American citizen must line up with one party or with another; so must the American people. Particularly is this true this year, when a change at Washington has, in my judgment, become imperative. Nor can I see any hope for the country in a third party movement this year. With so many vital problems needing to be grappled with by leaders in touch with the situation, it is a bad time, it seems to me, to experiment or to take on men, however large in "vision," but small in practical accomplishment and experience. Nor can I be for a presidential candidate who fought war-time prohibition and who was confessedly nominated by the "wet" element of his party.

I believe a man serves his party best who serves his country best. I am for party as a means of government, not for government for the benefit of the party. When a candidate is elected to office his duty then is to the whole people regardless of their party faith, or faiths. This is my political creed.

Here we have the revised conclusions of a man of intelligence and moral earnestness who a few years back thought he saw the way of political salvation for the country in smashing the parties—at least all parties other than his own, after the manner of a famous enemy of trusts, "except those I am in mit." Observation and experience at the seat of governmental activity and from the vantage point of a senator have shown him the error of his former views and taught him that wisdom lies, not in chasing rainbows, but in making the best of conditions as they are.

This leads the Argonaut to a recital that may interest its readers: Shortly prior to the Chicago convention the editor fell in with an enthusiastic Hoover man. The editor, while an admirer of Mr. Hoover and wishing his success in the then pending campaign in California, questioned the wisdom of diverting the prestige and the energy of a great citizen from unofficial to authoritative activities. Mr. Hoover, the editor argued, as a man then not definitely attached to any party, might fail in the presidency in respect of the fact that nobody lacking the support of a strong political organization may be successful in that office. In rebuttal Mr. Hoover's enthusiastic friend held to the idea that in detachment from party ties lay Mr. Hoover's greatest strength. Now—within the week—the editor again fell into contact with the enthusiast above referred to. Still clinging, but with diminished ardor, to his idol, he declared with tears in his voice that he could not understand Mr. Hoover's present attitude, illustrated in his acceptance of the Chicago platform and support of Mr. Harding, since "neither the one nor the other squares with the ideals illustrated in Mr. Hoover's known convictions and public utterances."

It is precisely at this point that your impractical and your practical man part company. Mr. Hoover, strong in knowledge, strong in moral purpose, strong in political conviction, is none the less a practical man. If called upon to define a scheme of government he would undoubtedly do it ideally. But as a man living and working in the world and with conditions as he finds them, Mr. Hoover wastes no time or vitality in idle longings for the unattainable, still less in railing at what can not be changed. Mr. Hoover knows, as does Senator Capper, that all governments fail more or less. He realizes that the best form of government the world has found up to date is government by the people through parties. So, not forgetful of ideals, not ignoring facts, looking the situation in the face, Mr. Hoover makes practical choice of that which to him seems best in the immediate situation. Instead of hiding the light of his character and his influence under the traditional bushel of protest against anything short of perfection, he strives to get the best attainable out of the conditions as they stand.

The Argonaut holds no brief for Mr. Hoover. It can not pretend to authoritative statement of his views—it can only give to his conduct its own interpretation. To the Argonaut his course accredits him as a practical man as distinct from a dreamer. He does not compromise any principle or yield to any theory he deems false. He seeks to make the best of situations and conditions as they present themselves. And in so doing he sets an example that it would be well for many who hold him in "ideal" admiration and for all others to follow. There is usually—we may even say always—a difference between the ideal line and the practical line. Short cuts to perfection there are none. The practical man—the man who most nearly combines achievement with idealism—is the man who makes the best of things. Such a man is Mr. Hoover, and those who may conceive that on his part there is compromise of principle or of standards in moving forward by the only available road exhibit the shallowness of their intelligence and the defects of their judgment.

Editorial Notes.

The particular brand of independence accorded by British policy to Egypt has more to its credit in the name than in the substance. Egypt is to be "independent"—it shall be so written in the bond—but the government of Egypt will not be privileged to negotiate treaties with other countries without British "O. K." Upon the theory that the Suez Canal must have protection a British military force is to be maintained in Egypt. And so on down the line of understandings and agreements, the independence of Egypt is to be limited and in a very definite sense made subject to British supervision. All of which will be of practical good to Egypt in that it will continue to yield that which in recent years has so tended to the material and moral betterment of the country. In truth it is difficult to see how Egypt could stand alone. She must in the nature of things have a senior partner—not to say an overlord—and Britain is obviously the best qualified among the nations for that particular mandate.

There is in the arrangement about to be promulgated between Egypt and Britain much that is remindful of Cuba's relationship with the United States. Cuba is nominally and in many respects actually an independent country. None the less Cuba stands in relationship to the United States definitely subordinate. Her government may do nothing of importance outside its own territory without American approval; and even within its own territory it must maintain order, sustain modern methods of sanitation, and otherwise sustain the country after the manner of a civilized and socially ordered state. This arrangement has now been in force practically a quarter of a century and it has worked well all round. It gives to Cuba a stability and a protection not practicable under absolute independence. It saves her the drain of heavy taxation. It gives her in connection with her industrial and financial organization a credit not otherwise available. Now and again we hear murmurs from Cuba, but in them there is never an echo suggestive of discontent on the part of the classes qualified by intelligence and property to sustain the interests of the country.

What England is about to give Egypt and what we long ago gave to Cuba points the way to the inevitable future relationship between the United States and Mexico. At the moment there appears to be a species of truce between the de facto—or theoretical—government of Mexico and her multifarious banditti. It is an arrangement without legal or moral basis and, regarded as a permanent status, impracticable. There are just two ways of maintaining order and of promoting progress in Mexico, (1) force under some strong hand like that of the late Porfirio Diaz, (2) oversight at the hands of some strong outside government. The day when force might have been developed from within is obviously past. To establish a reign of force would involve another and probably a protracted period of civil warfare, with the accompaniment of unspeakable horrors and wastes. The logic of the situation calls for a species of guardianship at the hands of the United States. In respect of the Monroe Doctrine no other country can be permitted to exercise such guardianship, and no other is in fact qualified to exercise it. We stand in the general recognition of the world both authorized and responsible in relation to Mexico. And first or last—the sooner the better for Mexico and for ourselves—we have got to get at the job.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR.

Reserved Powers of the States.

BERKELEY, CAL., September 2, 1920.

TO THE EDITOR—Sir: The power which the lawless national government has drawn to itself to determine its own rights and authority has so perverted the relations of the states to the nation that debauched public opinion has ceased to think soundly upon this subject, and states no longer offer vigorous resistance to usurpation of their most essential rights.
